Daily Talks by Mary Pickford

LOST-A GIRL.

Copyright, 1917, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate. Published by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, 110 N. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

I really feel puzzled over two letters that came at the same time. One is from a man in Chicago. He tells me that he likes my picture and enjoys the little daily articles, but the only thing he doesn't like about me is that I seem to discourage young girls from taking up the stage or picture work as a profession.

"Don't you realize, my dear Miss Pickford, if your mother had taken that course with you, you would never have been where you are today. Don't you think it is right that others should have the same chance that you have had?"

I wish I could make him understand how it was that I went on the stage at all. How, when my father died, my mother was left with three little children and an invalid mother who needed in a production in one of the local theaters just for one week, and someone who knew us suggested that I might fit the part. That was the beginning.

When I have given advice to young girls it has always been to those who were inexperienced and unprotected. I would like to see a little sister of his step out of her school work alone, into the maelstrom of theatrical life.

They have no conception of the patient, the quick-witted, the terrific strain, and above all practical knowledge of what is required of you, that are needed by those who would attain success. The non-professional person can never understand what it all means until he has had actual experience.

The other letter is from a boy in Chicago. He has recently come on to this country from Copenhagen, Denmark, and is seeking for some trace of his lost father. He writes me that he has heard that when he came to this country as a little girl twelve years ago, she tried to find various kinds of employment.

He received letters from her here, but she was white, and all of them had the same strain of longing. She was never satisfied with any position which she succeeded in obtaining. She wanted to go on the stage, like so many hundreds of other girls. He writes me: "I have not heard from her in several years, excepting one postcard saying she had got work in a picture company in New York. Can't you help me find her, please, Miss Pickford? Of course, she may be married, and that makes it so much harder to find her. Please help me."

I wonder how many other brothers Folk We Touch in Passing PURPOSE OF MAY.

By JULIA CHANDLER. Maytime hugged the face of the earth. Dandelions, white, and flecked the fields with yellow. The soft spring breeze stirred the bursting buds with a song that rose like a velvet flute note on the perfumed air.

But in this wonderful symphony The Man was a discordant note. The scales still hung before his eyes so that he saw, "as through a glass darkly," and he could hear neither rhyme nor reason for the perfect day.

"The Springtime is demoralizing," he told himself impatiently, as he noted the folk who took time to gaze ahead and drink into their consciousness the refreshment of the cool emerald tints of the woods.

"Of all the things God ever did the making of Springtime is the most senseless. What is the good of it save to entice men away from their jobs?" The Man demanded sacrilegiously.

Abashed in the analysis of his inexplicable frame of mind, he did not notice when he reached the outskirts of the little city, nor heed the turning of his feet toward the dandelion-flecked fields until suddenly he was arrested by an emerald bank just beyond a hedge and their voices came to the ears of The Man like a strain of tender music.

"Springtime," said the male voice. "The world is in its youth with love the main theme."

"It is all so wonderful, so beautiful—the Springtime. I am sure it was made for love," answered The Girl. "It was the first season in the garden of Eden, created as a setting for Adam and Eve—the proper background for the birth of Love," she went on to explain.

"See," interrupted the clear voice of The Youth, and so interested had The Man become in The Girl's explanation of God's purpose of Spring that he forgot he didn't wish to be seen away from the bank. He pursued his duties the mid-afternoon of a May day, and straightened himself with real eagerness just in time to see the intimate consultation of two little wrens over their half-built nest.

And, as he looked from the radiant face of the young lover to the little feathered mates, and on across the swinging, awaying wheat to the phalanx of budding trees that marked the edge of the wood, his dumb heart uttered a song. He touched the edge of the great gladness that permeates all the world. The scales were lifted from his eyes, and The Man knew why God had made the Springtime.

COURT ORDERS BABY'S RETURN. Justice Gould, of the District Supreme Court, yesterday ordered J. Raymond Brennan to return to his wife the 20-month-old baby which, it is alleged, he took by force from the home of his sister-in-law, 1209 New Hampshire avenue northwest, April 19. Mrs. Brennan secured a writ of habeas corpus, testifying that her husband and two men drove up to the house where she was staying and after a battle of words the husband took their young son, Joseph Doolan Brennan from his crib and carried him off.

HOROSCOPE.

Friday, May 11, 1917.

Uncertainty marks this day, according to astrology. While Jupiter and the Sun are in benefic aspect Mercury and Saturn are adverse.

It is a time promising to those who seek political preferment. Appointments made today should be lucky.

Men who occupy exalted places in worldly affairs should make the most of this day, which is supposed to encourage loyalty and good service.

The stars appear to indicate that those who are qualified to give counsel, whether in large or small matters, will receive an appointment of unusual significance this month.

Exposures of letters or writings will cause national scandals. There is also indication that a new service or chain of newspaper correspondents will be called to account for sensational activities.

The Queen of Holland is still subject to influences held to be exceedingly unfavorable. She may become involved in international affairs through her consort.

Warm and changeable weather that will be unfavorable for children may be expected during the summer months. Infant mortality may be unusually great.

Persons whose birthdays it is to have a happy augury for the year. Business affairs should prosper.

Children born on this day will be generally successful. These subjects of Taurus are often endowed with the gift of eloquence.

Answers to Correspondents. Lillian K.—Miss Talmadge is appearing now in the "Law of Compensation." You may write her in care of Selznick Pictures, New York City.

Margaret W.—Mary Pickford, Jr., is my sister's baby. Rosalie P.—Alice Brady is under her father's management, I think. "The Widow" has been restored so I am doing all my housework once more.

Bertha May B.—I do not wonder that you were thrilled over the scene in "The Bride of the Lark." You know in the taking of the picture, it is the coming of the tide, and I was very near drowned. You write a charming letter for just a little girl. May I blow back a kiss in return?

Clara W.—If you are determined to enter the motion picture field, prepare yourself just as thoroughly as you would for any other career. If you have real talent you are bound to succeed, but remember the field is already crowded with incompetent novices who cannot get work.

YOUR WEDDING DAY. And the Famous Men and Women Who Have Shared It. By MARY MARSHALL. May 11—Charles I and Henrietta Maria.

"I was the happiest and most fortunate of queens," wrote poor Queen Henrietta Maria in the days of her misfortune. "Not only had I every pleasure which heart could desire, but, above all, I had the love of my husband, who adored me."

But in this wonderful symphony The Man was a discordant note. The scales still hung before his eyes so that he saw, "as through a glass darkly," and he could hear neither rhyme nor reason for the perfect day.

WIFE ACCUSES HUSBAND. Charging her husband, Gustave Gleitman, who is said to be an employe of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with threatening and ill-treating her and choking his younger child, Mrs. Rachael Gleitman filed suit yesterday in the District Supreme Court for separate maintenance. Justice Hays issued a rule on the husband to show cause Friday why he should not support his family.
