DICKY

The day and night with the commandant, the collector of customs, the Jefe Pasa and his dogs among the native officials.

One day Dicky saw Pasa, the daughter of Madama Ortiz, sitting in the side-door of the Hotel des Estranjeros. He stopped in his tracks, still, for the first time in Corallo; and then he sped, swift as a deer, to find Vasquez, a faded native youth, to present to him.

The young men had named Pasa "La Santita Naranjadita." Naranjadita is a Spanish word for a certain color that you must go to more trouble to describe in English. By saying "The little saint, tinted the most beautiful, delicate, slightly orange-golden," you will approximate the description of Madama Ortiz's daughter.

La Madama Ortiz sold rum in addition to other liquors. Now, rum is the side-door of the rum shops whatever opprobrium attends upon the other commodities. For rum-making, mind you, is a government monopoly, and the Government dispensary assures respectability if not pre-eminence. Moreover, the saddest of precisians could find no fault with the Jefe Pasa and his shop. Customers drank there in the lowest of spirits and fearfully, as in the shadow of the dead; for Madama's ancient and dented hat, and her husband's even the rum's behest to be merry. For, was she not of the Iglesias, who landed with Pizarro? And had not her deceased husband been comisionado de caminos y puentes for the district?

In the evenings Pasa sat by the window in the room next to the one where they drank, and strummed dreamily upon his guitar. And then, by twos and threes, would come visiting young cavaliers and occupy the prim line of chairs set against the wall of the stage the heart of "La Santita." Their method (which is not proof against intelligent competition) consisted of expanding the chest, looking valorous, and consuming a gross or two of cigarettes. Even saints delicately orange prefer to be wooed differently.

Dona Pasa would fide over the vast chasm of nicotineized silence with music from her guitar, while she wondered if the romances she had read about gallant and more more conspicuous cavaliers were all lies. At somewhat regular intervals Madama would glide in from the dispensary with a sort of drought-suggesting gleam in her eye, and there would be a rustling of stiffly-starched white trousers as one of the caballeros would propose an adjournment to the bar.

That Dicky Maloney would, sooner or later, explore this field was a thing to be foreseen. There were few doors in Corallo into which his red head had not been poked.

In an incredibly short space of time after his first sight of her he was there, seated close beside her rocking chair. There were no back-against-the-wall poses in Dicky's theory of wooing. His plan of subjection was an attack at close range. To carry the fortress with one concentrated, ardent, eloquent, irresistible exclamation—that was Dicky's way.

Pasa was descended from the proudest Spanish families in the country. Moreover, she had had unusual advantages. Two years in a New Orleans school had elevated her ambitions and fitted her for a fate above the ordinary maidens of her native land. And yet here she succumbed to the first red-haired scamp with a sly tongue and a charming smile that came along and courted her properly.

Very soon Dicky took her to the little church on the corner of the plaza, and "Mrs. Maloney" was added to her string of distinguished names.

And it was her fate to sit, with her patient, saintly eyes, behind the sequestered counter of the little shop, while Dicky drank and philandered with his frivolous acquaintances.

The women, with their natural, refined instinct, saw a chance for vision, and delicately taunted her with his habits. She turned upon them in a beautiful, steady blaze of sorrowful contempt.

"To meat-cows," she said, in her level, crystal-clear tones; "you know nothing of a man. Your men are maroneros. They are fit only to roll cigarettes and shrivel them up. They drone in your hammocks and you comb their hair and feed them with fresh fruit. My man is no such blood. Let him drink of the wine. When he has taken sufficient of it to drown one of your faccios he will come home to me more of a man than one thousand of your pobrecitos. My hair, smooths and braids to me his sins; he himself removes my zapatos and there, there, upon each instep leaves a kiss. He holds—Oh, you will never understand! Blind ones who have never known a man who is not intended for his own happiness." Dicky, who had been convinced of an impression made, entered the shop, confidently, and advanced to open compliment.

Pasa, who had been waiting, flamed royally at his charming, to injudicious persistence; she commanded him to leave the shop; he tried to capture her hand—and Dicky entered, smiling broadly, full of white wine and the devil.

He spent five minutes in punishing the commandant scientifically and carefully, so that the pain might be prolonged as far as possible. At the end of that time he pitched the rash wooer out of the door upon the stones of Corallo as a masterpiece of lightning diplomacy.

Many letters arrived, addressed to "Mr. Dicky Maloney," or "Senior Dickey Maloney," to the considerable pride of Pasa. That so many people should desire to write to him only confirmed her own suspicion that the light from his red head shone around the world. As to their contents, she never felt curiosity. There was a wife for you!

The one mistake Dicky made in Corallo was to run out of money at the wrong time. Where his money came from was a puzzle for the sales of his shop were next to nothing, but that source failed, and at a peculiarly unfortunate time. It was when the commandant, Don Senor el Coronel Encarnacion Rios, looked upon the little saint seated in the shop and felt his heart go pitapat.

The commandant, who was versed in all the intricate arts of galantry, first delicately hinted at his sentiments by donning his dress uniform and strutting up and down fiercely before her window. Pasa, glancing demurely with her saintly eyes, instantly perceived his resemblance to her parrot, Chichi, and was diverted

SUGAR TO DROP IN PRICE AGAIN

Fourteen or 14 1/2 Cents Retail Cost Expected Following Wholesale Cut.

Washingtonians may expect a reduction in the price of sugar within a few days.

A recent cut in wholesale prices by the Federal Sugar Refining Company, from whom many local dealers buy, to 13 1/2 cents a pound, has been followed by a more drastic cut to 12 1/2 cents per pound. This, retailers say, will bring the price of granulated sugar down to 14 1/2 cents a pound within a few days.

Many merchants have large quantities of sugar purchased for 21 cents a pound, which will be unable to sell without sustaining considerable loss. It is expected the low price will continue throughout the winter.

New York, Sept. 30.—Mrs. Edith Kermit Roosevelt, widow of Col. Theodore Roosevelt, today urged voters for Harding and Coolidge to support the Republican candidates.
