THE SOCIAL PROBLEM

Rev. Mr. Pentecost Sees Hope Only in Henry George's Theory.

THE ADDRESS LAST NIGHT BEFORE THE ANTI-POVERTY SOCIETY—PROPOSED SOLUTIONS OF THE PROBLEM IN WHICH HE HAS NO FAITH—HE OUTLINES THE DOCTRINE OF THE LAND REFORM.

A man with a pleasing face, a long, dark mustache, and a pair of spectacles, stood in the hall of G. A. R. Hall last evening and talked about the social problem. This was the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, of Newark. His figure was straight, but well made, and speaks earnestly with the hand.

He was introduced by Rev. Mr. Pentecost, who said that he had no faith in the doctrine of the land reform, but that he had faith in the theory of Henry George. He said that he had read George's "Progress and Poverty" and that he had been struck by the theory of the single tax.

HICKMAN'S DEATH ACCIDENTAL

That is what the coroner's jury at Burville Decided Yesterday.

Coroner Patterson, with a jury composed of Levi Baker, John Weeden, W. M. Underhill, Francis Baker, Joseph Hill and Thomas Brickwell, went to Burville yesterday afternoon to hold an inquest into the death of William Hickman, the old colored man who was struck and killed by a train on the Alexandria Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Tuesday evening, as published in Wednesday's Star. The roads were very rough and muddy, and some trouble was experienced in reaching the village, which is a small settlement, nearly two miles from Jennings station on the short road. Arriving at the Hickman residence, the body was found laid out on two rough boards in a room about 8 by 10 feet. It was lying on its back, and the head was toward the corner. Several other persons gathered about the corpse. Six persons had been summoned as witnesses, but only three came to the inquest. The coroner, on the other hand, had a full complement of witnesses on the stand, and it was supposed that the other witnesses were either dead or in the hospital.

The killing of Hickman is a considerable indignation in the community where he lived, because of the fact that he was a colored man. The coroner's jury, however, decided that the death was accidental. The coroner, on the other hand, had a full complement of witnesses on the stand, and it was supposed that the other witnesses were either dead or in the hospital.

Were in a Merry Mood at the Entertainment

Sturdy cadets in conventional evening costumes of Virginia, aged 18, 19, 20, and 21, were the predominating elements at the fair of the Pocomac Boat Club at the National Hill Armory last night. The hall is handsomely decorated with the Pompadour of the colors of the rainbow, long streamers stretching from the four sides of the room to the chandeliers. The walls are hung with portraits and shades of flags, and the charging of ladies and gentlemen strolled around the room to the accompaniment of music. The fair was a success, and the cadets were in a merry mood.
