Dutch Neck Frocks.

Borne in upon me is the necessity for saying something about the Dutch neck frocks girls are wearing in the town as the model was originally, and one does not see girls of refinement wearing them in shops and trains.
The collarless gown cannot offend the most conservative, and has much to recommend it in warm weather, but such are literally what the name implies. The body is finished without any collar, and the line of gown comes just at the base of the throat. A linen or other wash frock with this finish is correct for back-about, and is worn by nice people.
The Dutch neck, in its original form, is now permissible for out-of-door wear in the country or at the beach, and for dinner when in town, but it is not correct for the street. The model of which I am writing is either round or square and is cut an inch below the throat. Yet, though gown form does not approve of these in town, save as one may be thought to have come

THE BRITISH CRISIS

XXIV.
In Stratified Barrooms.
By
FREDERIC J. HASKIN

LONDON, July 29.—Tradition tells of an Englishman who visited America and went back home to report that the chief difference between England and the United States was that in his own country the barmaid measured your whisky and let you pour your own water, while in America a barman measured your water and let you pour your own whisky. Starting as this difference may have appeared in his eyes, it is certain that an American in England, even if he confined his investigations only to barrooms, would find many differences quite as amazing.

Everybody who knows anything at all about barrooms knows that they abound in that intangible place called "local color." As the traveler fares in a strange country, if he be courteous, is wont to pledge his host in the wine of that country, so every nook and corner of the barroom is a scene of the peculiar methods and customs of selling and drinking liquors. The New Yorker in San Francisco is astonished when invited by a bartender to pour his poison out of an innocent silver teapot directly into the highball glass, without the intervention of a small whisky glass for measuring purposes. The San Franciscan in New York is none the less astonished by the appearance of the most extravagant Yankee who pours his drink awkwardly from the bar bottle upon the bar with an accuracy of judgment that is its own reward.

But the barrooms of England, particularly those of the London district, are like the saloons of the United States. In all other countries, east or west, all the things before the bar are done in a class, and there is a democratic camaraderie among drinking men which wipes out all distinctions of caste, color, or religion. The bar is a place where a Mississippi who sometimes looked too long upon the wine when it was red, his partner from the bar of the West, and when he was work for him to do none of the local tricks, when he had gone beyond a certain low stage. One day, being possessed of a terrific distill, he gave a dollar to a miserly hobo who came to the bar and asked the tramp to buy a bottle of whisky and bring it back to him in the barhouse.

The judge was an aristocrat of the ante-bellum southern type, whose oratorical bearing and classical education were a study to the hobo. Then, thick as thieves, they went to sleep together on the courthouse green. After a while the aristocrat, who was a burglar, was arrested by the sheriff and was broken into bits. Instantly the judge's demeanor changed. He drew himself up to his full height and in a voice of steel said: "Sir, I ask you to leave me. The tie that bound us has been broken."

London is devoid even of this democracy of drinking. Its barrooms are stratified and classified by the social position of the patrons. A man who would dare to use the language to be heard almost any hour of any day in an American saloon would need the aid of the police to protect him from the fury of the outraged patrons of the place.

Until a year ago children also came and were served with liquors up to the limit of their ability to drink and pay. The last parliament passed what is known as the "Children's Act." This law makes provision for juvenile houses of correction, for the separate treatment of juvenile offenders, and deals generally with the problem of the protection of child life. But its most radical feature was the incorporation of a provision prohibiting children under fourteen years old from entering public houses and forbidding publicans to serve them. In the United States, where even saloon keepers are on record as favoring the strict enforcement of the law, the prohibition might not seem radical. But in England it was hailed as an invasion of personal liberty.

In the last campaign as much was said about the horrors of this children's act as about any other one of the liberal government under the lower classes of London voters. Letters were written to the Times complaining that it worked a great hardship upon a mother to be forced to leave her children outside while she went to the bar to get a glass of beer. One irate correspondent said that on the occasion of a picnic somewhere in northern England, the county council was lying on the pavement in front of the village public house, condemned by the cruel edict of the radical government from any part of the village. The children of the mothers' glasses.

Although the classes and the masses are separated by the portals of the inn, they are united in support of the principle that it is the privilege of every man and child to do exactly as he pleases.

Democracy of Drinking Classified.

Unknown in England. In keeping with the various quarters of the city, ranging from the slums of Whitechapel to the palaces of West End, but each particular barroom in itself accentuates the class distinction of its customers.

Possessed of a penny, which is two cents in American money, the poverty stricken, but thirty Hooligan, may enter at the door labeled "Public Bar." Inside he may impinge upon the polished oak of the bar, and for his one penny the barmaid will serve him a glass of bitter ale. And then he may take his ease in the inn, the equal, socially and otherwise, of every other man in that particular room.

But if he will lean over the bar he will see another room, but half concealed by separating partition and a narrow glass screen set on the bar. That room is entered from the street through a portal bearing the legend "Private Bar." The same barmaid serves the same bitter ale from the same cask over a continuation of the same bar to the patrons of this more exclusive nook, and for each glass she charges tuppence, which is, being interpreted, two pence or another penny, and will wrangle his neck over the barmaid's refusal to serve him a glass of bitter ale. This is the very haunt of the aristocracy, for once within its sacred portals the Hooligan is served by the same barmaid from the same cask over a continuation of the same bar work the purchaser no less than "thrup-

WASHING CURTAINS CARE MUST BE TAKEN IN LAUNDERING CURTAINS

Washing of Fine Fabrics Is Not Difficult When Housewife Uses Precaution.

Summer curtains and draperies generally being of expensive material, it is essential that they should always be fresh and otherwise they have no beauty for their prettiness lies in their daintiness. Soiled, dusty or draggled-looking curtains are certainly worse than bare windows and doors could ever be.

Perhaps the entire absence of all curtains and draperies during the summer is the cooler plan, but much of the cozy effect is lost, so I think it will be better to dispense with heavy pieces of furniture and let the light draperies remain, for every housekeeper knows how much they help to furnish a room for summer.

The fabrics used for summer curtains are known as madras, both white and colored; dotted swiss, plain swiss, flannel, printed cotton voile, figured lawns and thin muslins.

None of these fabrics is really difficult to launder at home, so there is no reason why the housewife should prevent her curtains from adorning her home for the summer.

The white and cream-colored madras require a special care in renewing. The curtains should first be placed in clear cold water, in order to release the dust, and then they should be put in a tub or hold to the fabric, with the result that the curtains when finished appear to be a dirty white or a dull-looking cream.

This laying in clear cold water will apply to all curtains and draperies, whether white or colored. The latter it will be well to add a handful of salt to set the color.

After taking from the cold water the goods should be placed in a bath of warm suds. Often as I mention it, I again

3 RELIABLE SHOE HOUSES

CHILD'S PRETTY DRESS.

Delightfully cool and practicable is the child's frock pictured today. The dress could either be made up in fine white linen, with bands of dark blue linen, or for a more elaborate frock, batiste or fine lawn could be substituted for the linen, and embroidery used for the bands. The little waist is full and blouses slightly. The skirt is simply full to the belt. The wide bands used for trimming are piped on either edge with a bias fold of the material. This little design has a smart little air and a simplicity which should make it popular.

Disced Kidneys

Affect more parts of the body than any other disease. Your eyes fail, your back aches, your hands and ankles swell, you sleep badly, your urine is full of sediment. Before it is too late take the world's best remedy for the kidneys, liver, bladder and blood.

Read how Mrs. D. M. Hayes of 224 Drexler St., New Orleans, La., was cured after she had given up all hope: "Before I began taking Warner's Safe Cure I was in an awful condition. I suffered terribly from pains in my sides, back and stomach; also with severe headaches and sleepless nights. My eyes were also afflicted. These conditions have all disappeared, with the one exception that I feel occasionally slight pains in my back, but nothing like they were. I only took in all about six bottles of Warner's Safe Cure. To convince every sufferer from disease of the kidneys, liver, bladder and blood that Warner's Safe Cure will absolutely cure them a sample bottle and also a sample of the medicine, which will be sent FREE OF CHARGE, postpaid, to any one who will write WARNER'S SAFE CURE CO., Rochester, N. Y., and mention having seen this offer in The Washington Star. The genuineness of this offer is fully guaranteed by the publisher.

Spiced Vinegar.

This is specially good for cauliflower, cabbage, cucumber and other vegetable salads. For each gallon of good vinegar slice six small garlics, six onions, two horse radish roots, four ounces bruised ginger roots, four ounces mustard seed and two ounces each black pepper and ground allspice. Put in a stone jar and simmer on back of stove for eight or ten hours, then strain and bottle for use.

Pimento Sandwiches.

Run through a meat grinder separately, then together, to make the paste, one-half pound cheese, one can pimentos and one small onion.

For Amateur Cooks.

This is the time of the year when the economical housewife can, with very little trouble, make almost enough plain and flavored vinegars to last her during the year. For instance, put all apple and peach parings as they accumulate into a large tub, cover with water, and when soft, squeeze the pulp through a jelly bag and put the liquid into stone jars, adding just a pinch of salt. The next day add a little brown sugar—not more than a cupful to a gallon of liquid. Tie a cloth over the mouth of the jug and set in a warm place to sour. If a little "mother" is started, he soon gives up the attempt. The instant it is destroyed and in future it will be difficult indeed to make him acquire habits of neatness.
