IMMIGRATION.

XXIII—Immigrant Charity Seekers.

By Frederic J. Haskin.

It has been recognized that there are thousands of immigrants who come to America, and get lost in the busy life of this bustling country. While the immigration commission began investigating the matter, not only did it gather what data it could in the few years allotted, but it also digested the statistics of the census bureau on pauperism in America, and these, also, of the bureau of immigration, the figures of the two bureaus extending from 1880 to 1908.

Its own plans of investigation were made after conferences with the officials of the field department for the extension of organized charity in the United States. In addition to receiving general information concerning charitable assistance rendered to immigrants in certain typical industrial centers, it secured data relative to aid furnished immigrants during certain periods by charity organizations in a number of typical cities.

thirty thousand cases of people who had received charitable assistance, and it was found that nearly two-fifths of these cases were those of immigrants, while only one-tenth of them were cases of children of immigrants. In Milwaukee, Buffalo and Cleveland two-thirds of the cases were immigrants; and the percentage in Boston, Chicago and San Francisco was more than three-fifths. In a number of cities more than half of the cases were immigrants. The inquiry revealed the fact that there were nearly four people dependent upon the average immigrant who received assistance. It furthermore showed that the immigrants, as a whole, tried to get along, and that only in one-fifth of these cases presented was the fault that of the breadwinner. In three-fifths of the cases aid was necessary because the breadwinner lacked employment or had insufficient wages to support those dependent upon his labor. The hardships of the family were less frequently due to the neglect or bad habits of the breadwinner in the cases of immigrants than in the cases of native Americans, in the case of the immigrant they affected fewer dependents.

A silent commentary upon the greater dangers to which the immigrant is exposed, when compared with the native born, is seen in the nature of cases which require charity. Of these American charity seekers aided, 27.7 per cent were aided because of the death or disability of the breadwinner; in the case of immigrants, 30.2 per cent.

Some races are much more given to seeking charity because of the neglect or bad habits of their breadwinners than others. More than one-fourth of the charity cases among the Finns, the Lithuanians and the Norwegians was due to the neglect or bad habits of the head of the family, while in the case of the Dutch, the Hebrews, the Italians and the Syrians less than one-eighth of the charity seeking was due to these causes. The Syrians experienced more difficulty in getting along because of lack of employment or insufficient earnings than any other race, and they did not seek charity for many other reasons. Three out of every four cases of relief sought among them was the result of no work or low earnings. On the other hand, less than half of the Swedes were helped upon these grounds.

In nearly all of the other statistical inquiries by which immigrants, their children and native Americans may be compared, this one shows that the children of immigrants approximate the native standards, as a rule, and fall between the immigrant and the American of native parentage. The children of immigrants received aid less frequently because of neglect or bad habits than the children of native parentage, and likewise needed aid fewer times because of death or disability of the breadwinner. The children of immigrants who are unable to speak English, and less than one-fourth of the immigrant charity seekers themselves are unable to do so.

The care taken to admit only able-bodied immigrants and dependents who have relatives both able and willing to support them, has tended to reduce to a minimum the need for charity, and pauperism is the exception and not the rule. But it was not always so. In the earlier days, when immigration was unregulated, immigrant pauperism was one of the most serious evils of immigration, and this was enhanced by the fact that many European communities preferred to pay the cost of the expense of the government, rather than provide for them in almshouses. It is recorded that in many instances a large proportion of an entire shipload of immigrants would be so destitute that it was necessary to transport them directly to poorhouses, where they were cared for until they could get work. The records of the poorhouses of that day show that they were a refuge for thousands of immigrants who had just arrived in America with no other asset than the scant clothes upon their backs.

One of the things which helps to keep down the number of charity-seeking immigrants is the fact that those who come over and fall in their battle for living may be returned within three years at the expense of the government. Often it happens that when an immigrant finds America too hard for him, he suddenly develops symptoms of incurable disease, and finds himself unable to work. He keeps up the deception until he reaches the immigration authorities, and if he transcribes their names to his native land without expense to himself.

On the whole, the immigrant may be commended for his pluck in fighting the battle of life. He frequently has to start out in lines of work which afford the smallest compensation, and when he finds himself unable to support his family and low wages mean a very stern fight with poverty. And furthermore, his burden is made heavier by the lack of helpful encouragement from the native Americans around him. His problem of earning a living is not a simple one, and he has little chance to lay by any day's earnings. He does not know the necessities he cannot buy. He makes a noble, if unheralded, fight against adversity, and the wonder is that he is not forced to seek charity more than he does.

Theodore Raneratos, an Elkton, Md., merchant, will go to Greece, his native country, for service in the army.

FORCES BREAD WRAPPING. SENATOR McCUMBER INTRODUCES BILL DESIGNED TO GUARD HEALTH.

All bread sold in the District of Columbia will have to be wrapped, if Congress passes a law which Senator McCumber has introduced.

Persons, firms or corporations engaged in the manufacture of bread are prohibited from removing bread, intended to be sold, from the building in which the bread is baked, before inclosing it in a suitable sanitary wrapper or package that will protect it from dust, insects or other contamination.

It is also made unlawful for a dealer or other person to sell, deliver or cause to be delivered any bread to be sold which is not properly wrapped.

The penalty for each offense, as described in the bill, is a fine not to exceed $100 or imprisonment not to exceed three months, or both, for each offense.

Asks $100,000 for Horses.

The army remount depots have been depleted by the mounting of cavalry and other regiments returning from the Philippines, and Secretary Stimson has asked Congress to make immediately available $100,000 of the $25,500 estimated to be necessary for the purchase of horses for cavalry, artillery, engineers, etc., for the next fiscal year.

Wants $125,000 for Scales.

Secretary MacVeagh wants $125,000 for continuing the construction and installation of special automatic and recording scales for weighing merchandise in connection with imports at the various ports of entry. He has asked Congress for that amount, $40,000 to be made immediately available.

John Woody, seventy years old, died Wednesday at his home, at Madison Heights, Va., of carbolic acid poisoning. He drank the acid Tuesday in the presence of his family.

DENY CONVICTION IS FOR CONTEMPT

the ordinary rules applicable to civil suits, whereas in the present case the proceeding is criminal in its nature and rules and methods particularly applicable to criminal cases should prevail here.

Respondents Not Bound.

"It cannot, therefore, be suggested that the respondents herein were bound in any respect by the conclusions reached in the several cases by Justice Wright and could, if, however, the opinion in the court below is considered correct it will be quickly seen to what an extent the learned justice below was indebted to these prior opinions for his facts and conclusions."

What counsel denominates as a curious fact is the condition claimed by them to be presented that, although the respondents have been found guilty and sentenced to severe punishment for supposed defiance of the orders of court in practically continuing a boycott against an institution under the protection of the court after the passage of an injunction order, there is no affirmative evidence of any kind in the record, from beginning to end, of the existence of any illegal boycott whatsoever affecting in the slightest degree, the affairs of the Buck's Store and Range Company after December 23, 1907.

The several respondents deny any knowledge of the existence of such a boycott, and no witness has been put upon the stand who has referred to a single instance proving or tending to prove its actual existence.

Methods in England.

A review of the treatment of alleged contemptors in England, as set out in the brief of the labor leaders, shows that, without exception, from the time of Magna Charta to the death of Henry V, every single case of contempt was dealt with alone by action, information, presentment or indictment, and that in not one of them was it thought by the courts necessary that there should be a summary proceeding without a trial by jury. It seems that for hundreds of years summary proceedings were unknown in England, even for contempt in open court, which offense was so far criminal as to be prosecuted by all criminal methods and a trial by jury absolutely requisite. Mr. Bailin claims that his argument in favor of the criminal nature of contempt may be summed up as establishing three propositions:

"1. There is no essential difference historically or in principle, in cases of direct contempt between the information upon which the courts act and the information in any other criminal case."

"2. That while higher crimes are triable by a jury, lesser ones, including contempt, may very often be tried upon information or affidavits, without a jury, right of trial by jury relating only to the grade of the crime and not to the existence of an act as a crime."

"3. That the statutes of the United States having defined the crime and fixed the punishment for the same (in this instance), the offense against the statute is a crime."

All Points Taken Up.

All the questions raised at the trial are dealt with in the brief, including an attack on the method of procedure adopted in instituting the contempt proceedings. The claim is made that Justice Cloud was without authority in May, 1911, to refer the matter to Justice Wright after the United States Supreme Court had reversed the former contempt proceedings and when there existed no matters of contention on the one side and the Buck's Store and Range Company on the other. The proceeding should not have been entitled in equity, it is also claimed.
