

WAR BRINGS CHANGES IN D. C. SCHOOL COURSES

Study of Thrift and Current Events Among the Most Important.

Discussing President Wilson's suggestion that public schools throughout the United States should adjust their courses to meet the needs brought about by the world war...

Thrift is Necessary. "The nation is already beginning to realize that thrift is a patriotic necessity and an economic necessity..."

Develop New Courses. "We may have to develop new courses, especially focused on or around this tremendous period. The teaching of history is bound to be materially affected by this war..."

MICHAELIS TO TAKE UP ALSACE-LORRAINE ISSUES

PARIS, October 2.—A dispatch to the Havas Agency from Basle, Switzerland, quotes the Nester Nachrichten of Munich as saying that the imperial German chancellor will resume next week his conference with the deputies from Alsace-Lorraine with a view to settling the status of those provinces.

Our Waste of Fruit a National Crime - SAVE THE FRUIT CROP

"Sweeten it with Domino" Granulated, Tableted, Powdered, Confectioners, Brown

Sold in 2 and 5 lb. cartons and in 6, 10, 25 and 50 lb. cotton bags.

Of Interest to Women

A CAPE COAT FOR STREET WEAR.

BY ANNE RITTENHOUSE.

Special Correspondence of The Star. NEW YORK, October 1.—Last spring the house of Cheruit got out a cape that was exceedingly interesting.

This year it will be repeated. Those who look upon the new garment insist that it is a leftover from last May, but the truth is that the designers like the idea of the combination coat and cape so well that they have decided to continue it and trade upon women's liking for a comfortable garment, in order to secure a large sale for it.

Last summer the wholesale houses got hold of the model so early and sent it out through the ready-to-wear channels in such cheap workmanship that it may prove a trifle difficult for the high-class dressmaker to get her price for a garment which is only a renewal of an old fashion.

It Gives Warmth. The reason women like this garment is the security it gives against wind and cold. No one has ever believed that a cape was anything more than an admirable adjustment of graceful lines, of course, there are exceptions, as, for instance, the long, warm, weighted cape that is worn by the Italian police.

The sketch shows the kind of wrap that has taken the fancy of women and is exploited by the tailors. It has warmth and beauty. The top coat is apt to be bulky and it is not always becoming to the figure, but the cape usually reaches a high degree of artistic perfection. Therefore, when a garment has a cape back and coat front it insures to a woman an attractive silhouette and a comfortable warmth.

The garment as shown is made of one of those new and admirable materials which are velour on the outside and jersey in gray-green and scarlet.

It is trimmed with silver braid and buttons.

ing any time, he dated back to the safety of the dear old Bear Patch. "Ha, ha, ha," laughed a funny, squeaky little voice. "What's the matter, Peter?"

Peter looked up with such a foolish expression on his face that Flitter the bat wheeled and doing all sorts of antics in the air just overhead. "Why don't you give a fellow a little warning?" he demanded indignantly. "How was I to know but you were Hooty the Owl?"

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "Just imagine poor little me being

Peter Rabbit sat just beyond the edge of the dear Old Bear Patch watching the Black Shadows creep out from the Purple Hills across the Green Meadows. He was trying to make up his mind whether to go over to the Green Forest or up to the Old Orchard or to visit Farmer Brown's garden. The Black Shadows crept swiftly over the Green Meadows and the first star began to twinkle faintly. Still Peter sat there undecided which way to go. Suddenly something swept close to Peter's head and he caught just a glimpse of something black in the air.

Peter ducked. Then, without wast-

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

LITTLE STORIES For BEDTIME

By THORNTON W. BURGESS. (Copyright, 1917, by T. W. Burgess.)

Peter Rabbit Ducks.

Peter Rabbit sat just beyond the edge of the dear Old Bear Patch watching the Black Shadows creep out from the Purple Hills across the Green Meadows. He was trying to make up his mind whether to go over to the Green Forest or up to the Old Orchard or to visit Farmer Brown's garden. The Black Shadows crept swiftly over the Green Meadows and the first star began to twinkle faintly. Still Peter sat there undecided which way to go. Suddenly something swept close to Peter's head and he caught just a glimpse of something black in the air.

Peter ducked. Then, without wast-

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

LITTLE STORIES For BEDTIME

By THORNTON W. BURGESS. (Copyright, 1917, by T. W. Burgess.)

Peter Rabbit Ducks.

Peter Rabbit sat just beyond the edge of the dear Old Bear Patch watching the Black Shadows creep out from the Purple Hills across the Green Meadows. He was trying to make up his mind whether to go over to the Green Forest or up to the Old Orchard or to visit Farmer Brown's garden. The Black Shadows crept swiftly over the Green Meadows and the first star began to twinkle faintly. Still Peter sat there undecided which way to go. Suddenly something swept close to Peter's head and he caught just a glimpse of something black in the air.

Peter ducked. Then, without wast-

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

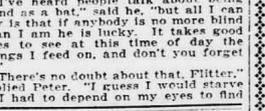

LITTLE STORIES For BEDTIME

By THORNTON W. BURGESS. (Copyright, 1917, by T. W. Burgess.)

Peter Rabbit Ducks.

Peter Rabbit sat just beyond the edge of the dear Old Bear Patch watching the Black Shadows creep out from the Purple Hills across the Green Meadows. He was trying to make up his mind whether to go over to the Green Forest or up to the Old Orchard or to visit Farmer Brown's garden. The Black Shadows crept swiftly over the Green Meadows and the first star began to twinkle faintly. Still Peter sat there undecided which way to go. Suddenly something swept close to Peter's head and he caught just a glimpse of something black in the air.

Peter ducked. Then, without wast-

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"

Peter looked up, but he couldn't see anything. Flitter sneezed, started down and Peter heard the snap of his jaws. "That was good," exclaimed Flitter. "I didn't see anything," replied Peter. "I don't understand how you saw that bug when I couldn't."

Flitter laughed his funny little, squeaky laugh again. "I've heard people talk about being blind as a bat," said he, "but all I can say is that if anybody is no more blind than I am he is lucky. It takes good eyes to see anything. I take good care to see my food, and don't you forget it."

"There's no doubt about that, Flitter," replied Peter. "I guess I would starve if I had to depend on my eyes to find

food as small as the insects you live on. I never thought of it before, but in that the reason you dart about in such a funny way? And do you get all your food in the air?"

Flitter seemed so truly sorry that right away Peter recovered his usual good nature. "I'll forgive you this time, Flitter," said he, "but don't do it again. It makes me feel lumpy all over. Did you catch the bug?"

"Of course, I caught the bug," replied Flitter. "There's another right over your head now. Watch me catch him!"