

On the March
With
Uncle Sam's
Fighting
"Devil Dogs"
International Photos.

Following the roads where fighting men of another day passed to Gettysburg and the historic battle.

Brig. Gen. Smedley D. Butler (on gray horse), in charge of the 5,000 marines, leads his men into Frederick, Md.

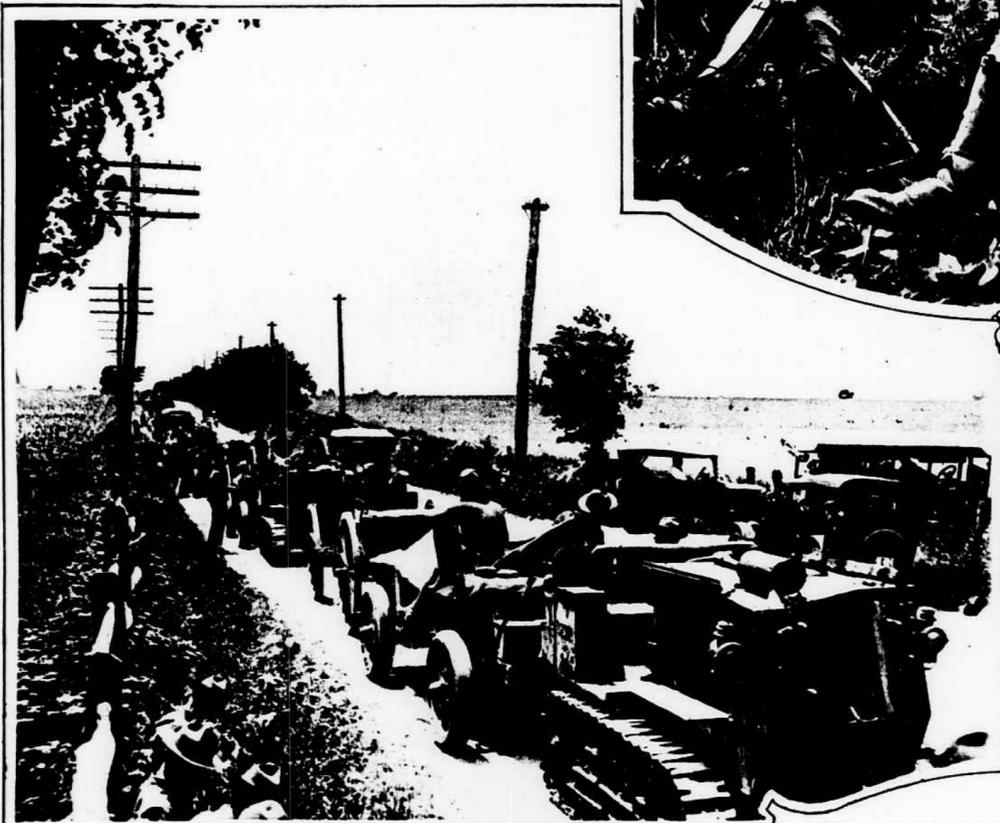

No fighting unit is complete without music. Photo snapped in a Frederick street.

Machine gun company passing through a village where more than fifty years ago men in gray and men in blue trooped their way to the nation's greatest battlefield.

"Somewhat tired, but father proud of the whole bunch," says Gen. John A. Lejeune to Gen. Butler. Photo snapped in the Frederick camp. (Above in oval.)

These modern implements of war, passing along country roads, were a novel sight to the good people of Gettysburg and vicinity.

Since the days of Caesar armies have traveled with truck and baggage vans bringing up the rear—and so they follow the marines into Frederick town.