
"DR. JEKYLL." By day was a hard working young business man, a good husband.	"MR. HYDE." By night he tip-toed from his home to become a thief and a murderer.	IS HE CRAZY? Berthram G. Spencer of Springfield, Mass., says blow crazed him.
--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------

A Collection of Some of the Things Stolen by Spencer.

Springfield, Mass. Nov. 17.—Did a blow on the head when a child make Bertram G. Spencer, on trial for the murder of Miss Martha Blackstone, March 31, 1910, a "Mr. Hyde" by night, when he revelled in robbery and even murder? He says it did.

By his side in the courtroom sits Spencer's young wife, a pretty girlish woman, upon whom Spencer said he lavished the proceeds of his robberies while lying to her as to how he got them. In his home, with his wife and babies he was the "Dr. Jekyll."

Bertram G. Spencer.

By day, respected in business and social circles, a hard working young business man, as night came on an unrestrainable desire to commit crime came over him, he told the police.

Then rising from beside his sleeping wife, he tip-toed out of the home, donned the black mask, and was a thief.

Watches, rings, silverware, everything of value, he took at the point of his revolver.

On the night he entered the Dow home, where four women lived alone, he first met with resistance. Miss Martha Blackstone resisted and screamed. A bullet killed her. For a time it looked