

HOW THE VENIREMEN CALLED IN THE McNAMARA TRIAL ARE DRAWN—CLERKS BUSY ON A LIST

Left to Right, C. P. Doane, Special Clerk; Geo. Monroe, Clerk of Dept. 9; Waldo Fallon, Secretary to Judge Bordwell; in the Foreground, Atty. Jos. Scott.

Each judge of the superior court prepares a list of names of men—and in the future, maybe women, too—whom he thinks are good, fair-minded citizens and would make good jurors.

These names are handed in to the presiding judge of the superior court. He has the right to go over the list and cross off any names he sees fit if he thinks, for any reason, they would not make good jurors.

Then he has his clerks check the names over and look for duplicates in the lists. After this is done, the tax list is referred to to see if the names were on the last roll.

Then each name is written on a separate sheet of paper and put in the jury wheel. From this wheel the names are drawn by chance. A summons is then made out and placed in the hands of the sheriff.

The picture shows the clerks in Dept. 9 drawing a new list of veniremen. As soon as a new list is drawn both the prosecution and the defense are anxious to get a list of the new names so that they may set their detectives to looking up the record of the prospective jurymen and ascertain their
