IMPORTANT CLUE TURNS UP IN HOLSTEIN MURDER CASE

The first important discovery made by the police in the murder of 14-year-old Bennie Holstein, slain in a clump of bushes in Morgan Park, came today, when the owner of the steel carpenter's punch found beside the body was located.

Ella Wright, a negress, 1820 Meadow street, identified the tool as one which had belonged to her dead husband, who was a carpenter. She noticed the punch had disappeared about two weeks ago. A short time after one of the negro boarders at her home left.

Two colored boys and one white youth are still held by the police, but they stubbornly deny any knowledge of the crime. Harold Riley, one of the negroes, is believed to know the whereabouts of the missing boarder from the Wright home.

This is the only tangible clew on which the police are working. If it is exploded they will be completely at sea.

Samuel Edelstein, who went away with Sam Holstein, brother of the murdered boy, was taken to the scene of the crime by detectives. The two boys wrote a postal from Waukegan the day after Bennie was murdered, and signed his name. They declared they were only trying to allay the fears of Mrs. Holstein, who was worrying about the disappearance of her young son.

A mysterious woman who called the police over the telephone and refused to give her name was responsible for the arrests of the two negroes now held. She said she would appear at the station later.
