

the 12th, and a pass, double-and-error followed, giving the enemy three runs and the game.

Fred Beck slipped a cog in his thinking apparatus in the tenth inning, or the locals would have walked off with the game. Stanley had walked with one out and was singled to third by Flack. Stanley scored on an out, knotting the count. Flack was on third.

Beck was at bat with the count two balls and one strike. Flack sized up the situation, and noted that the pitcher was taking a regular wind-up before each delivery. He decided it was a good place to steal home. He sneaked up the line, and just as Krapp started his elaborate motion streaked for the plate.

Two Poses of Kavanagh

And he had the base stolen cleanly. Krapp's throw, however, was squarely over the plate, and Beck could not resist the temptation to swipe at it. It would only have been the second strike, and Ferd showed poor judgment, as he was easily thrown out by the shortstop.

Hanford of Buffalo was the wicked man with the bat, poling four hits