

a Hindu is at the head of the cult Bhattachanga might possibly be able to shed some light on his identity.

There is no direct information that the head of the cult is a student at the university, but the police fear he may have been preying on the sorority girls by strange Oriental tales and charms.

Bhattachanga is said to be working on a book entitled "The Social Psychology of Sex."

He denies the charge of having been guilty of any offense toward the little girl. He was arrested shortly after he penned the following lines to a well-known professor:

"I am determined—always was and still am—to build up my little science in the teeth of all opposition. It has cost me all that I had—money, good name and what not. All that I have left is myself. I may just as well sacrifice that little on the holy altar of my own ideal."

Other than the present charge the young Hindu has an admirable record at the university.

Grand jury investigation will be started immediately if the alleged cult is ferreted out by the police.

THE LAW'S KILLING

The usual aftermath follows the war in Colorado. Some fifty union miners are indicted by federal grand juries, for murder and conspiracy.

These men are poor men. They will have to suffer imprisonment, the effects of idleness and all the other penalties due to the law's long delays. They will have to spend months and months fighting against the death penalty, and all those dependent upon them must suffer.

Meanwhile, those responsible for the slaughter of women and children at Ludlow will live luxuriously in their palaces, and attend church regularly.

After the drunken militia and the brutal gunmen, the vengeful, torturous law!

It is one-sided.
