

fell in love with her. But in his talk with her he learned her name. He hurried back to his father to tell him he had found a devoted friend of his youth, whom the father had longed for years to find. That friend was your father, Millie, and I am the father of the young man I am telling you about."

Millie's senses wavered, her breath came quick. She wondered—she raptly hoped.

"I came on to greet my lost friend," proceeded Mr. Marsh, "and as well to study the young girl who had stolen my dear boy's heart. Millie, you remember him—Cyril, my son."

"Yes," palpitated Millie, in a subdued tone, "I can never forget him."

"You say that! I hope it!" cried Mr. Marsh joyfully. "You will become my daughter—Millie, promise me."

She burst into happy tears. She nestled close into those fatherly arms. It was her reply and the old man's face was radiant.

"Cyril!" he called, and from the shrubbery there advanced the subject of all Milly's love dreams.

MOSTLY JABOT IS THE NEW JABOT BLOUSE

The jabot has returned to favor—and with it comes the jabot blouse, which is mostly jabot, for the pendant is a deep, softly pleated ruffle which falls from bustline to waistline and extends across the front of the blouse.

The new blouse is a sort of Peter Pan affair, with high rolling collar, but the Peter Pan shield is cut out at the neck in V-shape and from this V the jabot drops in a cascade of tiny folds.

Three pearl buttons fasten the shield. The jabot blouse is charming in crepe de chine or sheer lingerie.
