

worst kind of an opportunist. The Republicans have the heaviest artillery, and, if we are to take Napoleon's word, they are sure to win, for "God is on the side of the army with the best artillery"—or something to that effect. The Republicans have also left much unsaid.

The independent voter, after reading all that has been said on both sides, can find no reason or excuse for voting for either of them. Each side has convinced him that the other side is all wrong. They have given him facts by the column full. They have used all the logic and rhetoric at their command. Not in vain—for they have convinced him that neither party is deserving of his vote. Now what is he to do? How is he going to vote?

That depends upon intelligence and discrimination of the voter. It depends upon his convictions on other matters, upon whether or not his is what may be called an impartial and analytical mind. Not being well versed in psychology and the workings of the human mind, the writer will have to pass that on to the more experienced readers.

However, if the mind of the "independent" voter has not yet reached its full development, if he is not informed about the principles and the men of the only other party worth considering; if he has never voted any but the two party tickets and is fearful of "throwing away" his vote; if they are paying well for votes this year; or if the boss expects him to do the "right thing"; then let him choose the lesser of the two evils and cast his vote for Wilson.

As for the real intelligent voter, who after a critical scrutiny of the political parties and their principles decides to vote, the writer ventures to predict and risks his reputation as a prophet that he will vote for Benson, bet on Hughes and thank God for Wilson. He can't go wrong. Let every man do his duty. We hope for the best.—Herman Mugrauer.
