HUNGRY FOR HOME APPLES.

What Our Soldiers in the Philippines Want Most of All.

"It is no wonder our soldiers in the Philippines think an American apple food for the gods, when you look at the thing those Filipinos call an apple."

"But the fact remains," resumed the scientist, as he tenderly laid the remains in his scrap basket, "that it never was more than a taunting reminder of our huculose fruit, and probably was never dignified by the name of apple until some of our soldiers, with visions of the knotty little crab apples of some parts of our country dubbed it that. In fact, it is little more, even in its prime state, than a crab apple of an inferior sort."

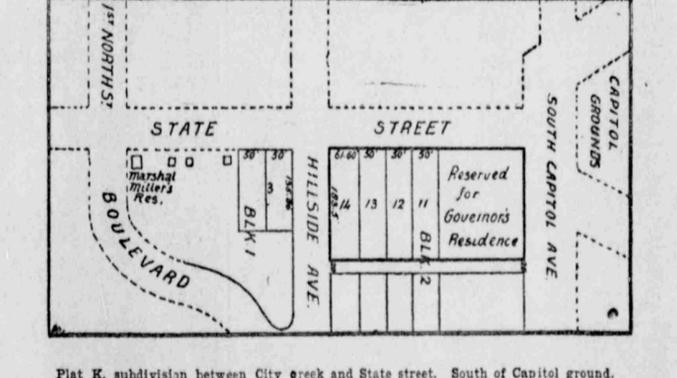

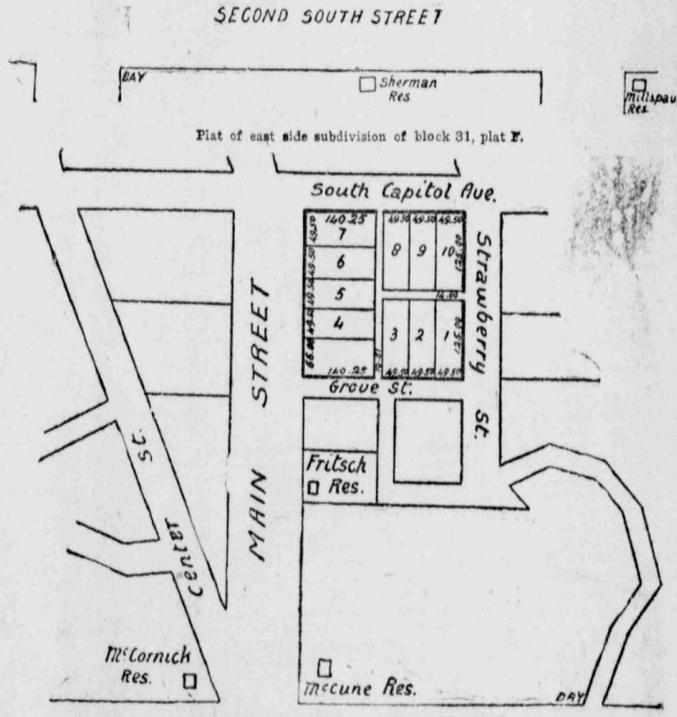

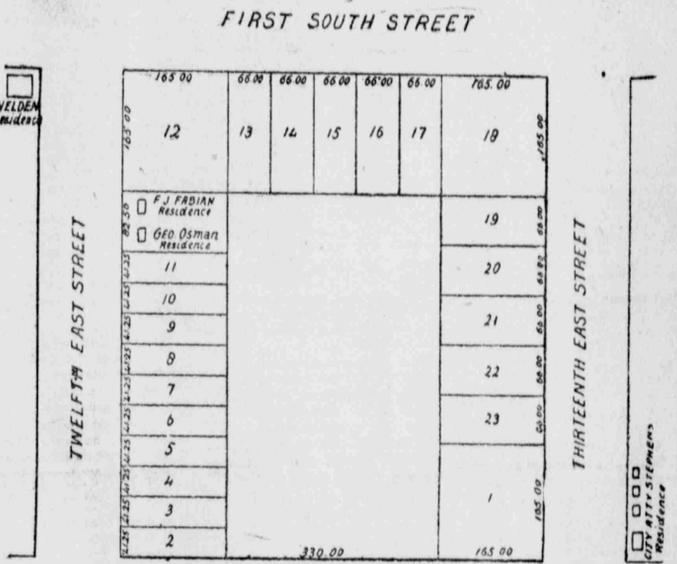

"So our soldiers beg for apples, real American apples, as a hungry man would for bread, while the most luscious tropical fruits hang all about them."

"The note that accompanied this specimen," with a rueful gaze at the basket, "was a pitiful appeal for an introduction of our own luscious fruit. He wrote that an apple loving soldier would trade a whole month's rations for a good, big, juicy apple, and it made me feel homesick for him."—From a Washington Letter.
