AMERICAN WOMEN OF TITLE.

There are now in England four duchesses of American birth, and there is no end to the American wives of peers who hold less exalted titles. One of the duchesses was selected to be one of the four who should carry the canopy of the queen in Westminster abbey. This honor to the duchess of Marlborough was, of course, intended as an expression of the kindly feeling that the nation, so far as it is interested in such matters at all, feels for the little American duchess, who has so far managed to preside with so much grace over duties which must have presented many problems to a girl reared in America, even though she were the daughter of a millionaire family.

Her grace of Marlborough is said to have made her way in England by her sweetness and simplicity of character rather than by the possession of some of the brilliant qualities that made the success of other American women who have married into the English aristocracy.

The American duchess of Manchester is Miss Zimmerman of Cincinnati. She has been living quietly in England since their marriage, endeavoring to pay off the debts of the duke. That happy result seems less remote in the future than it was some years ago, and the dowager duchess will undoubtedly soon have her son restored to all the privileges of his title, which his financial troubles had made difficult for him for a time.

For various reasons, largely domestic, the present duchess has not seen a great deal of English society, nor is it to be expected that she will ever become as dominating a figure as her mother-in-law. But she has made friends and will doubtless make more when it is possible for her to go about. The Manchesteres are not often seen in the court society, and it is said they made no plans to go to the coronation ceremonies.

The fourth American duchess is also a dowager. She married the father of the present duke after the death of her husband, Louis Hammersley, who left her a life interest in a large fortune. After her marriage to the duke she lived, of course, in Blenheim palace. When her husband died and the present duke came to the title, she was married to Lord William Bessford, who was the racing partner of the late Pierre Lorillard and a popular sportsman in England. He died soon after the dowager duchess has lived in England, where she has made many friends. She was a Miss Lillian Price of Troy. Her marriage to the duke of Marlborough took place in the summer and was entirely without ceremony. It was performed in a Methodist church in the presence of only one or two persons.

The most brilliant entertainments given this year in London were the two musical parties that W. W. Astor and Mrs. John W. Mackay gave.

The countess of Craven, who is a daughter of Mrs. Bradley Martin, is one of the popular young American countesses in London, and so is the countess of Essex, who, as Adele Grant, was a well known beauty here and in Europe before her marriage to the Earl of Essex, whose second wife she is, she is older than the other countesses and has so little money from her husband that it was not long ago said that she was to open a real estate office in London and let furnished houses.

The countess of Stratford was Mrs. Samuel Colgate and was born Cornelia Smith of Wallingford. Her first husband left her a large fortune, and a few years ago she was married to Lord Stratford, who was considerably younger than she. He was killed by falling under a train soon after their marriage and removal to England. The countess of Stratford has a daughter, Miss Colgate, who is to make her debut in London society next season.

Other American women in London who have high places in the aristocratic set are Lady Neylor-Leyland, who was the beautiful Jennie Chamberlain of Cleveland, and is now a widow and the owner of a beautiful house in London; Lady Falkland, formerly Miss Reed of New York; Lady Vernon Harcourt, who was a daughter of Motley, the historian, and Lady Lister Kaye, a sister of the dowager duchess of Manchester. The Hon. Mrs. Dudley Leigh was formerly Miss Beckwith of this city, and although she is not of as high a title as some of her compatriots who have married in England, she has a social position that is of the highest. Her husband belongs to an old family.

Joseph Chamberlain could not give the handsome Miss Sincroft of Boston a title when he married her, but she has her share of worldly importance as the wife of the conspicuous politician, and she is said in England to have had much to do with his success.

Mrs. Cavendish Bentinck, who was Miss Bessie Livingston, may not have a title, but the king and queen recently showed her the favor of taking dinner in her house, which is proof enough that even in England one need not have a title to be at the top of the heap. Mrs. Bentinck is a sister of Mrs. Ogden Mills.

The Hon. Mrs. Ramsay, whose husband is a brother to the late Earl of Dalhousie, was a Miss Garrison, daughter of the late William R. Garrison. Mrs. Arthur Paget, a daughter of the late Mrs. Paron Stevens, was from the time she married Captain Paget of the guards one of the most popular women in London society and was conspicuous as being one of the first women to be a friend of the Prince of Wales and of the princess. She is one of the most conspicuous women in society in London, and her husband is a man of wide acquaintance and general popularity. Mrs. Pierre Lorillard Ronalds, to give her the full name, which is rarely used when referring to this active figure in London life, has a small house in London, but she entertains there most of the prominent men and women in the British capital. Probably no other American woman in London is so well known as she; but few have lived there so long.

Lady Bessie Cunard, Lady Gray Egerton and less conspicuous American women are also among the number who have married titles in England and added to the fame of this country of producing charming women.—Chicago Tribune.
