TURBANS ARE MUCH WORN WITH DRESSY COSTUMES.

This turban is not for the tailored suit alone but has been proved by this year's Paris fad for evening turbans of swansdown, tulle and fur. This graceful "brim" turban has a rounded crown of sable fur and at the side are arranged two willow plumes in rose and brown shadings, one plume falling directly over the other to give height to the hat. The brim is an entirely new effect, made of knotted satin ribbon in rose and brown shades, the small twists of the ribbon giving the effect of tiny flowers massed closely together.

In Woman's World.

The National Child-Rescue league is now an accomplished fact, says the Delineator. The actual membership now numbers several hundred and every mail brings a material increase. Every new member asks the same question: "What can I do to help?"

We were prepared for that question. There is ready a complete and carefully-thought-out program of active service for every league member. One step of that plan will be outlined in that portion of these pages given to the National Child-Rescue league every month.

The first step is to get new members. A membership of several hundred is gratifying, but far from sufficient to accomplish the purpose of the league—to place every normal child now in an institution in a family home. This is a matter requiring a national sentiment; the fused desire of millions of people is necessary to accomplish such an object.

You who have expressed your willingness to help have therefore, this your first task set before you. Get into the National Child-Rescue league your next-door neighbor, your friend, your pastor, your grocer, every intelligent human being with whom you come in contact. We need them; the league needs them; the 100,000 children who are waiting for us to release them from soul starvation need them. Use the sympathy aroused in you to this end. Let the next issue that goes to press number the National Child-Rescue league by thousands, and we shall be ready for the next step in behalf of the homeless child.

For some mysterious reason the chubby, earthyware casserole, so dear to the heart of every thrifty French housewife, is a cooking utensil practically unknown in the majority of kitchens on this side of the water. To the average American housekeeper the restaurant term en casserole seems necessarily to imply some elaborate concoction of game, sweetbread or other equally expensive food; and to view the casserole in the light of an everyday household friend and helper is an idea that apparently has never occurred to her.

In point of fact, this essentially French kitchen cooking utensil is nothing more or less than a clay saucenpan; coarse and somewhat porous-looking on the outside, and glazed on the inside. No matter what the size, the typical casserole is always shallow in proportion to its other measurements, and is characterized by its short, stubby handle and its more or less well defined lip for pouring.

It is generally admitted by those who know that anything cooked in one of these odd earthenware dishes has a peculiarly delicious flavor, or, perhaps more properly, a blending of flavors, which baffles description. Just what the mystery of casserole cooking is cannot be put down in black and white, but certain it is that in no other way is such a gastronomically perfect result achieved. All casseroles should come direct from the stove to the table, and serving should be done from the dish itself. Lay three or four pooled and cored apples, cut into rather thick slices, on the grating of your roaster, sprinkle them with sugar and place your chicken or half chicken upon them. Rub the meat well with butter, cover and roast. In roasting pork, 25 minutes should be allowed to the pound. When the time is up, take out the meat and put it into another baking-pan, turning up the side that was beneath the roaster. Rub this with butter and strewn with pepper and salted crumbs and put in the oven to brown. Rub through a colander the apples and the drippings from the meat, add enough boiling water to make a cupful of the sauce, thicken it with a tablespoonful of flour rubbed in one of butter, season with salt and pepper, and when it has boiled up once send to the table in a gravyboat.

There is no charge that a New York or any other American for that matter—dislikes quite so much as that of provincialism. Attack our ethics and our morals; call us cold, heartless, pleasure loving, vain—and we will smile complacently, but even whisper that we are the country cousins of the Londoner or the Parisienne—and you wound us at our most vulnerable point. There is no sneer that hits home quite so unerringly as the "We-do-these-things-so-much-better-on-the-other-side, don't you know" with which foreign visitors sometimes meet our most strenuous efforts toward cosmopolitanism.

A single visit to one of our restaurants or theaters will convince you that the conventions of evening dress are either shockingly misunderstood or deliberately defied by the average woman of means and position. She wears a hat and a high-necked dinner gown—a costume as inappropriate for an evening affair as a bright red frock at a funeral.

Of course, I am speaking primarily of city life and of women who frequent our restaurants and theaters, and on them I cannot urge too strongly the value and importance of the demi-toilet for semi-formal wear.

I was very much interested, a short time ago, in hearing a discussion on the subject of evening dress among women of moderate means. The chief reason that was advanced for its general disregard—economy—did not seem convincing. An evening gown need not cost any more than any other kind of a dress, and if a woman grumbles at its limited usefulness there are all sorts of clever makeshifts of collars and chemisettes that will let an evening gown see the daylight.

No; the true reason is that the American woman is not accustomed to seeing the décolleté gown in public places; she has not been brought up to it. She feels self-conscious and ill at ease in evening dress at any but certain recognized functions. She ought to feel ill at ease and provincial in anything else. I hope the time will soon come that she will feel so. Not until she writes to me and says, "I like such and such a dress—the high-necked evening frock."—The January Delineator.

A few nights ago I met a well known dressmaker who has the reputation of being one of the best-dressed women in New York, says Helen Berkeley-Loyd, in the January Delineator. I changed to admire her gown—a lovely clinging thing in faint mist-blue crepe de Chine with a touch of poppy red in the bodice. The dress was a year old, she told me, and she considered it as good style today as when it was first made. The skirt was a trifle full, perhaps, the sleeves not quite so close to the arm as they should be, but the general lines of the dress were perfect.

It set me to thinking of the many, many letters that come to me from women to whom a new dress is not an incident but an occasion. Women who write to me asking, "I like such and such a style, but it is rather extreme, and I am afraid it will not look well another year. If you were in my place, would you get it?"

The dressmaker of the plaited skirt are continually asking me, "But, surely, whether plaited are quite done for, I always hasten to reassure them on that point. One of the best establishments on Fifth avenue is making a nine-gored with a skirt that is practically as close-fitting as any of the gored or circular models. To be sure, the plaited are few and shallow—and are switched down about to the knees. The plaited are omitted at the hip seams, and the front side seam is buttoned over the next one toward the back.

Still another New York designer is making a specialty of plain skirts with inset plaited panels. His three best models came from abroad, I believe. One is a four-gored skirt, buttoned down over the hips with a plaited panel set in each side seam.

His second skirt, which I fancy will be quite as popular as the first, is in seven gores, with a very shallow fan-shaped plaited skirt at each seam. The plaited portions are about 15 inches deep, and are so narrow that they do little to detract from the plain impression of the skirt. It is an excellent model for the trotteur, for it is seen at its best in walking. It has the gored waistline like many of the new skirts.

His third skirt, also high-waisted, is in six gores, and with the plaited portion forming the entire lower part of the front breadth. The same skirt is frequently made with a plain front gore, eliminating the plaited entirely for those who do not fancy them.
