SALT LAKE CITY ITS GLORIOUS PROSPERITY

"No inland city of the continent lies in such a field of beauty, unites such rich and rare elements of nature's formations, holds such guarantees of greatness, in general and social, in the good time coming of our Pacific development. I met all along the plains and over the mountains the feeling that Salt Lake was to be the great central city of the West."

So wrote Samuel Bowles, Editor of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, from Great Salt Lake City, in Utah Territory, on the 14th of February, 1849. In the handful of houses then lying here in the expanse of a far-reaching desert, the great editor saw the beginning of the city which now rivals in beauty and out-ranks in importance any other in the Rocky Mountain empire. No other city was ever founded in such a forbidding region—so far away from human inhabitants—no other city ever had so much to contend with—judges of both nature and man—the odds of the wilderness and the warfare of the creeds. But all these have been swept away, and today Salt Lake holds dominion over the trade and industry of an area rich and productive enough to insure many times over the fulfillment of the prophecy of Samuel Bowles.

The great railroad building enterprises now going forward from Salt Lake, will make Salt Lake City the greatest railroad center in the Intermountain West.

It has been said that a tributary area of at least 300 miles in diameter is essential to the building of a city. Salt Lake City is the center of a region whose lines that in diameter—a region containing a diversity of resources such as no other similar area in the world possesses. These resources are in the beginning of their development, and yet, in the matter of mineral alone, were the annual output to cease, the whole world would be affected. Cities have their best growth during the period of the development of the countries that surround them. Every discovery of metal, every utilization of native raw material, every area redeemed from desolation and given to the plough in their tributary region, adds to their growth.

The principal mining of the United States is within her tributary country, which consists of western Colorado, western Wyoming, all of Idaho, all of Montana, a great part of Nevada and all of Utah. For five hundred miles in every direction, silver, gold, lead and zinc are at work. They all pay tribute to Salt Lake in one way or another. No other mining city of the United States is so favorably located. Denver is on one extreme of the mining region, San Francisco on the other, but Salt Lake is at the very center. Wherever they are, they are more conveniently reached from Salt Lake than from any other point, and mining men who operate properties upon the Colorado, California, Arizona and Colorado reside in Salt Lake. Every mine west of the Rocky Mountains that seeks a purchaser, adds to the growth of Salt Lake, where there are millions available for meritorious mining enterprises. There are streams of ore from every direction, flowing constantly to the Salt Lake smelters, and streams of money going out of Salt Lake banks to pay miners and mining expenses. Salt Lake's supply houses furnish all kinds of machinery and supplies. Mining stocks are sold in the Salt Lake Mining Exchange, and the litigation that sometimes unhappily arises over conflicts of territory, is handled by Salt Lake lawyers.

There must be in every mining region a residential center for the men who own the mines. For the region mentioned Salt Lake is that center. Whenever fortune smiles upon the prospector and miner his first thought is of a home in Salt Lake. That this is true hundreds of mansions in Salt Lake, some of which would fitly be described as "palaces," will testify. There is nothing in the property line quite so good to have as a successful mine. There is nothing more so good for a city to have as successful miners. Under their lavish touch centers grow in beauty and wealth with almost Aladdin-like speed.

But not alone in the ways mentioned will Salt Lake profit from the mines. Ores need to be reduced to money—and that is done in the smelters. Nature has been singularly prodigal in giving to Salt Lake a diversity of ores and fluxes essential to successful smelting, and on that account Salt Lake has been growing year by year as a smelting center, until, with the completion of plants now building, it will be one or two times over the largest smelting center in the world, and hence a total treatment capacity of 20,000 tons per day—a matter of 7,200,000 tons per year—more tons than Colorado raises out of its hot mines every year. These smelters will require thousands of men in their operation, and thus will Salt Lake greatly increase her population.

Not alone upon mining, however, does Salt Lake depend for her present prosperity and future greatness. There are great areas of grazing lands covered with sheep, cattle and horses. There are many thousand acres under cultivation that rival in productiveness the lands in the valley of the Nile. There are vineyards of enormous annual output. There are industrial institutions other than smelters, which utilize the raw materials of the state, and which employ thousands of operatives, and there is room for more. Manufacturing was one of the earliest things taught in Utah. It was the thought of Brigham Young that Utah ought to produce everything within her borders needed for home use, and from the very earliest time the great leader taught the people to bend every energy towards the development of the state's manufacturing interests. Excerpts from "Our Point of View," by Ed. F. Colburn of the Salt Lake Real Estate Association.
