

FOR DR. DAWSON

A Nurse, Two Doctors and a Fireman on the Stand.

SOME STARTLING STATEMENTS.

The First Three Told of Mrs. Dawson's Erratic Conduct, the Last One Does Not Remember.

The Dawson divorce case, which was resumed in the superior court yesterday before Judge Humes, needed no better advertisement than the street scene yesterday morning between Col. E. M. Carr, of counsel for the plaintiff, and Charles Esplin, who is named as one of the co-respondents in the case. The result was that when the case was called at 2 o'clock in the afternoon the court room was crowded. The testimony adduced in favor of the plaintiff, Dr. Dawson, was highly sensational, and twice during the examination of one of the witnesses Judge Humes was forced to call for order, once administering a sharp rebuke to the witness for the same reason. Only four witnesses were examined. They were Mrs. Mary Jensen, Dr. F. H. Coe, Dr. C. W. Sharpley, and Robert Johnson. As the hour of 6 o'clock approached, Harold Preston, of counsel for the plaintiff, suggested an adjournment, and the case went over until this morning.

After disposing of a few minor matters, and excusing the petit jurors until Tuesday morning, September 8, Judge Humes called in a formal tone, "Dawson against Dawson," and from one end of the crowded room to the other there was a perceptible thrill of interest. Just at that instant Col. Carr came in by the attorney's entrance, and every eye was directed to his face in quest of scars of his recent battle with Esplin. Those who had expected to see him badly disfigured were disappointed, and at a short distance it was difficult to tell that he had passed through such an encounter. As a quietly seated man in a formal suit, he seemed to be a stranger in the courtroom. The sensation he advanced and took his place at the table along with L. C. Gilman and Harold Preston. By their side, and within three feet from them, were the two sisters, Mrs. Charles H. Almond and Mrs. Edward H. Reynolds. To her right sat her counsel, J. T. Ronald, and to her left, the witness, Dr. F. H. Coe. Every chair was occupied by some attorney or interested visitor. Judge Osborn stepped to the witness stand, and finally took a seat. Outside the bar a number of well-known people mingled with the crowd. In the corridors Charles Esplin, the other side of the morning, strolled up and down, apparently expecting to be called as a witness. And so the case proceeded.

The first move was a request from the plaintiff's counsel for a commission to take additional depositions at Los Angeles, coupled with the request that the customary notice of intention be waived. The defense protested against the taking of more depositions on either side. Mr. Thompson expressed the wish to have the case tried and ended.

"Nearly all our depositions," he said, "were taken with a view to meeting the case made by the Kinsey. Now that she makes fresh charges, and if the plaintiff insists on taking additional depositions, we shall have to take some also. We object to the taking of depositions at Los Angeles, and we object to the proposed shortening of time for taking them by waiving notice."

Notwithstanding the protest Judge Humes fixed the time for the taking of the depositions, remarking, "the court does not indicate what its course will be in waiting for these depositions."

A Good Witness.
The first witness called was Mrs. Mary Jensen, whose husband lives in a ranch in Whatcom county, but who has herself for several years lived in Seattle. She is the widow of a man who was an attorney at law, and who during the interesting developments which led up to the present divorce suit, she proved a veritable treasure for the plaintiff, so far at least as the general impression made by her on the witness stand is concerned. Her motherly assistance and gentle manner at once drew her in favor, and as she proceeded with her story the favorable impression was confirmed, and when she passed successfully the searching fire of Mr. Carr, she was very cross-examination, she positively evinced the sympathy of her audience.

From the inevitable preliminary that she knew the plaintiff and the defendant, Mrs. Jensen went on to tell that in 1892 she had been employed by Mrs. Dawson; that she remained in the service of Mrs. Dawson until about seven months; that during that time Mrs. Dawson received frequent attentions from Frank Carroll. "The first time I met Mr. Carroll," said the witness, in answer to various questions from Mr. Preston, who was conducting the examination, was one night about the 11th of October. "I was going out to dancing school. She had on her bonnet and looked as if ready to go out. I met her at the door, and she was all alone in the house. I started to hasten the back door. As I passed along I noticed a rustling of the curtains that hung between the dining room and the parlor. This frightened me, for I thought there was no one else but me in the house. The curtains parted and Mrs. Dawson came out of the parlor, which was dark. She was followed by Mr. Carroll, whom she introduced to me. Both of them looked confused. I was confused and started myself. This was between 9 and 10 o'clock. They then left the house and were out in about 11 o'clock."

"Was Mr. Carroll at the house often while you were there?" asked Mr. Preston.
"No, my yes; he was there lots of times."
"Did Mrs. Dawson often go out with him?"
"No, my yes; lots of times. Sometimes they would say out till 9 o'clock; sometimes till 10; sometimes till 11. Twice I remember they stayed out very late."

"Was Dr. Dawson ever with her about her conduct with Mr. Carroll, and she promised she would give up going with him, but she didn't. I don't think Dr. Dawson thought at that time that she had been guilty of anything beyond imprudence. I spoke to Mrs. Dawson myself about it."

"Yes, she used to telephone to Mr. Carroll often. Twice I heard her tell him through the phone that she'd meet him at the same place, but I don't know where that was."

"And she used to get letters from Carroll. How do I know that? Because she used to read them to Annie. Once I heard her reading one of them. She told Annie it was a love letter. Once the postman brought a letter and gave it to her neighbor. Dr. Dawson asked me whether there was any mail, and I told him there was one letter for Mrs. Dawson. He told me to bring it to her. I did so, and she thought he had better have it, and I gave it to him. If Mrs. Dawson had seen the letter I would have given it to her, for Mrs. Dawson asked me to say nothing about it. Dr. Dawson asked me if I did not tell her, and she said that she had gotten a letter at the postoffice for Mrs. Dawson from the same person, and that he was going to speak to her about it, and he did. When I talked to Mrs. Dawson about her conduct I told her it was looking bad and she'd better give it up or there might be a shooting scare. She only laughed and said, 'I don't care.'"

A DAWSON CASE SIDE ISSUE. Many Threats Lead to an Encounter and Rich, Red Blood Flows on the Sidewalks.

The side issues in the Dawson divorce case have become almost as interesting and sensational as the case itself, with its hosts of witnesses and its volumes of depositions. A week ago a bloody encounter between Mrs. Dawson and Mr. Carr, Esplin's witness, was inserted into Mr. Kinsey's testimony by his abrupt departure from this city with a gory proboscis, and afterwards said he was not sure that he had repeated to Dr. Dawson anything except the first part of his wife's conversation.

Had Been Drinking.
Dr. Caspar W. Sharpley testified that in November or December, 1895, Mrs. Dawson came to his office to consult him professionally, and inquired about the divorce under the influence of liquor. Asked what he understood by her general actions, he said he "her face was somewhat flushed, though not particularly so; her manner was more familiar than usual; she talked more than usual, and more effusively; and it occurred to me that she stood unnecessarily close to me while talking. I don't know positively that she had anything to drink with her, but she had what I took to be a bottle wrapped up in a package. I took it to be a bottle of wine, and I asked her where it was. She said it was port wine, and she answered that she had drunk it, adding, 'Won't you have some?'"

The next witness also proved interesting, but in a very different way, owing mainly to the fact that he had been summoned by the plaintiff, but he had nothing to say. His name was Robert Johnson, and he works in the engine house at Fourth and Battery, having been a member of the Seattle fire department for about eight years. Mr. Preston evidently expected him to testify that he had once at least seen Mrs. Dawson in an encounter about liquor, but the witness persistently refused to make any such declaration, and the listeners were left to wonder why the witness had been called had not Mr. Preston sprung the following question and repeated it with emphasis enough to show that he was not in any way an assentor. "Did you not in my office, in February or March, 1895, in the presence of Thomas E. Jones, Col. E. M. Carr, L. C. Gilman and myself, state that you had seen Mrs. Dawson, meaning the defendant, late one night, on her way home, so drunk that she kept the sidewalk with difficulty, or that the sidewalk was not wide enough for her, or words to that effect?"

The witness could remember making no statement, and stated that the woman he had seen anything at all about her had since become convinced might not have been Mrs. Dawson at all. Then Mr. Preston suggested an adjournment, and the case went over till 3:30 o'clock this morning.

THE HUSBAND WINS. This Time It Is the Wife Who Is at Fault.

While the great Dawson divorce case was pending before Judge Humes yesterday, Judge Osborn signed a decree of divorce in a case of first class deep interest, those concerned, though not attended with so many sensational features. It was the case of C. E. Hill vs. L. A. Hill, a party married in Seattle nearly six years ago. The court found that the wife had been guilty of violent conduct toward her husband, and that she had deserted him, and that she had abandoned the child, a 6-year-old child to San Francisco, and that she had taken the child to Seattle and took it to a place by no means calculated to improve its juvenile morals. The court consequently granted the husband a divorce, with permission to the mother to make occasional visits. The wife also sued for divorce, but Judge Osborn decided that the husband and not the wife should be granted the decree.
