There was much interest manifested when Foraker rose to speak. "I want to say at the outset," he announced, "that I will vote for this resolution or something like it. In adopting the resolution the senate should act in accordance with international law.

There is no question of recognizing the independence of Cuba, because no one claims intervention was also out of the question declared, for reasons which he proceeded to explain.

"That," said Foraker, "was the end of this country's effort at mediation." The record shows, he continued, that the United States government has attempted at intervention to secure peace by means consistent with the honor, dignity and the continued sovereignty of the Spanish monarchy.

Cuba had no right to ask the United States for this intervention, nor Spain to object to it. Foraker then read at length from the Olney letter as well as the consular report which is credited to Gen. Lee. He referred to the condition of 900 or 800 Americans in Cuba.

Foraker admitted that if Cuba was a country with which the United States had transactions there would be cause for the United States to take no notice of the war. The whole country, he asserted, was united as to the point of the expediency of recognition.

It would not regard it as a serious loss. I have found in the state department claims for property amounting to many millions for the destruction of American property in this rebellion, and in each and every instance the presentation to the United States government from the secretary followed by a long diplomatic correspondence, winding up in every case, without a single exception, with a claim, and it is a notorious fact that if Spain did recognize them she would be unable to pay them.

It was true, Foraker said in conclusion, that the United States should be paying the losses. It is admitted that this partnership in a brutal and hellish war. Foraker replied to Foraker, contending that the senate should have authoritative facts before it.

He did not know whether if a Cuban or an anti-Cuban citizen were to be handed in such business, he should not be put to death. Federal soldiers had been executed in the American rebellion after they had been court-martialed for burning a military bridge.
