CHAPLIN SAILS FOR ENGLAND AS EX-WIFE'S LAWYER SUES HIM

Left to Right—Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford and Charlie Chaplin aboard the Olympic.

Comedian Gay on Board the Olympic, Though Attorney Asks $10,000.

Sorrowfully wiping a glycerine drop from one eye and cheerfully removing a tear from the other for the benefit of 1,143 newspaper photographers, movie men and amateur camera fiends, Charlie Chaplin sailed yesterday on the White Star liner Olympic, to spend a month in his old home at Brixton, England.

The magnitude of the reception which was in store for him on the broad beach of the Olympic pier overwhelmed the comedian. He smiled much more broadly than he permits himself to in the movies, looked helplessly at the massed front of camera men, all shouting directions, and dissolved into blishes. Later he recovered sufficiently to perch on the rail and respond to directions of the temperamental camera men.

According to cable reports from abroad, all London is interested in the return of the comedian, although more than half a dozen lawyers have gauged to say farewell to the mimic when he was a boy at Brixton. His admirers will see a young man by no means so thin or so awkward as he appears on the screen, with regular teeth, public safety glasses, and a pallid complexion. Yesterday he wore a blue suit with a narrow stripe in it, straw hat, white shirt with soft collar, and a black tie.

Shortly before the ship sailed Doug and Mary Fairbanks hastened up the gangway to bid their friend, the third member of the big three and the photographed with him. Chaplin was surrounded by a crowd of admirers, which included a large percentage of the good looking women on the ship and most of the children.

He said he was not planning to make any pictures abroad. Asked about the latest report that he was to marry, he answered: "No marriage for me ever again. I'm through."

All of which leads on naturally to the second section of this story, which is that Charlie was named as defendant yesterday in a suit for $10,000, begun by Frederick E. Goldsmith, lawyer, who was engaged as counsel for Mildred Harris Chaplin in this city, pending the outcome of her divorce in California. The divorce was granted, Chaplin paying Mrs. Harris $100,000 in settlement of all claims.

The difference between Chaplin and Goldsmith lies in whether the lawyer's services were a necessity or a luxury. Chaplin said he thought he had settled everything when he paid the $100,000, and that it was up to his wife to pay Goldsmith if any such payment was necessary. Goldsmith said yesterday: "The question between Chaplin and myself is whether or not the services of a lawyer are necessary. I claim my services were necessary to Mrs. Harris, and that her husband is responsible for them because they were rendered while they were man and wife. He insists that they were not necessary, but a luxury."

Mr. Goldsmith also has brought suit against Mildred Harris in California for the same amount he seeks to recover from Chaplin in this city.
