

up to the Lipman apartment. Mean- while Mrs. Lipman had gone into her bedroom and telephoned to the West 134th street station. Patrolman John McLean was sent to the house.

Before the policemen got there George and the other negro had persuaded Whaley to put on his coat and go to the apartment, which he did with many mutterings and threats that he would be back and kill everybody. "You're making my head hurt," he shouted. "You're making my head hurt!"

George and the other negro tried to hold Whaley until the policeman came, but he broke away from them and ran to the stairs. He went from floor to floor, banging on doors, screaming and jumping about in the halls, and finally he went to the roof. By this time the apartment house was in an uproar, with tenants running wildly from their apartments, thinking either that the house was on fire or that a gang of bad men had invaded their homes.

There are eight cops up there," he yelled. "I'll stay here until they get away."

George and the other negro were trying to get him to go away when Patrolman Motz entered the door. Curiously enough, the instant he caught sight of the policeman Whaley became calm, the wild light died out of his eyes and he said: "Well," he said, "here I am. Let's go."

The policeman searched the negro and found that he was not armed. Whaley made resistance when the officer handcuffed him. He tried to try to escape when Patrolman McLean walked him to the station house and into the back room, where he was told to sit down in a chair and wait for the doctor to come from Harlem Hospital.

Five minutes after McLean took the negro into the back room of the station, told him to sit down and then removed the handcuffs from his wrists. Patrolman Motz appeared with a prisoner who had given his name as Mattie Martins of 1321 Valentine avenue.

Patrolman Motz found Martins standing in the middle of the street, yelling and cursing at the officers. He arrested the man and took him to the West 134th street station, but there are no cells at that station and Lieut. Leith, after being asked by Patrolman Motz to take him to the West 124th street station had lock him up.

Send for an ambulance and have that head fixed up when you get down there," said the policeman. So Patrolman Motz took his prisoner to the West 124th street station. He paid no attention to Whaley when he went with Martins. The negro was sitting quietly enough. His eyes roved a bit, and now and then his face twitched and he pressed a hand to his chest.

Whaley was sitting at this time in the middle of the floor, and Patrolman Motz put Martins into a chair about ten feet away. Whaley was very drunk and when Dr. Waldman of Harlem Hospital had difficulty in making him keep still so he could dress the wound on his head. The policeman had to hold him. Motz did this, of course, since the man was his prisoner and he was responsible for him until he was locked in his cell.

Whitfield was arrested, and a few days ago Justice Burr in the Supreme Court upheld his extradition. O'CONNELL PUT BACK ON POST. Patrolman James J. O'Connell, who was suspended after he shot Patrolman Frank C. Broder of the Alexander avenue police station, was restored to duty yesterday by Commissioner Enright.

Patrolman Motz seemed to know instantly what had happened, and he clutched at the negro with his right hand, his left arm being about neck level in his coat sleeve. But he was not quick enough, and the policeman who leaped forward as soon as they saw the revolver sliding from the holster, was a quick enough. Whaley rose to his feet quickly, there was a flash and an explosion, and Patrolman Motz collapsed in front of the supposedly insane negro with a bullet through his temple.

It was only an instant later that every policeman in the place had jumped to his feet and hurried himself forward to grab the negro. Hagstrand, closest of all to Whaley, was in the lead. He grabbed the negro by the neck and Whaley jammed the muzzle of the revolver in his stomach. He pulled the trigger, but Hagstrand squirmed and twisted and it wouldn't go down and the firing pin could not hit the cap of the cartridge. The negro had no chance to fire again.

In the room at the time Holmes Hagstrand and Motz were Patrolmen Stewart, Joseph Gorey, John Quinn, Daniel Buey and Assistant Walter Miller. The brother of the Detective Miller who was killed by the negro Luther Boddy, there had been others, but they had gone out; several were in the main room, talking to the sergeant on duty, and others were wandering about idly. Upstairs in the detectives' room were half a dozen detectives, besides Lieut. Joseph Thompson and Capt. Patrick O'Neill. They ran down when they heard the shot, and they found the negro behind the policeman already there in throwing themselves against the negro.

Patrolman Motz was thrown half way across the room after he had got a grip on the negro's neck, and others were treated the same way. One Whaley, after some one had wrenched the gun from his hand and there was no longer any danger that he would kill any one, was so hard to subdue. He put up the leg over the sill before he was grabbed and pulled back into the room. For more than ten minutes he fought the police, and he was finally subdued and run down the stairs at the first sound of the trouble, but at last he was subdued and lay panting and exhausted upon the floor.

But even as he was carried to the cell and locked up he shouted that he would kill all the policemen he could because they had beaten Boddy. He was charged at first with felonious assault, but when word was received at the station house that Patrolman Motz had been killed in hospital this was changed to homicide.

Ready to Kill Just One More. But Whaley put up a terrific fight. The policeman who finally subdued him said afterward that the man seemed possessed of the strength of a dozen men; they had never seen any one who was so hard to subdue. He put up the hardest fight that any of them had ever experienced. Time and again the policeman would have him pinned to the floor, smothered, it seemed, beneath the weight of the bodies, and yet he would hurl them to one side and regain his feet, where for an instant he would stagger and wave the gun, trying desperately to bring it down on the head of one policeman before they got him.

Offers No Resistance. The policeman searched the negro and found that he was not armed. Whaley made resistance when the officer handcuffed him. He tried to try to escape when Patrolman McLean walked him to the station house and into the back room, where he was told to sit down in a chair and wait for the doctor to come from Harlem Hospital.

End of Armament Parley Now Seen by February 1

Special Dispatch to THE NEW YORK HERALD. New York Herald Bureau, Washington, D. C., Jan. 19. It was estimated today that the Washington conference would adjourn in about two weeks. It had been expected some time ago the conference would not run beyond January 20. The vast amount of work connected with the naval treaty and the settlement of Far Eastern questions is responsible for the slowness of the conference to get through an earlier date. All delegations, however, are optimistic over the satisfactory settlement of these questions.

Seek Evidence of Good Faith. Another generally approved policy is to insist that the European Governments give evidence of their good faith by removing the basic causes for continued economic demoralization—namely, the open door, the United States debt, the separation by clearly defined lines of demarcation between political and economic projects; substantial evidence that Soviet Russia is fit to participate in a council of orderly, humane and civilized governments.

HYGIENIC DIET

Hard foods are a necessary part of a hygienic diet—the teeth need exercise. Also, hard foods cause the saliva and gastric juices to flow more freely. This is especially true when, in addition to being hard, the food is dry. The delicately browned slices of toast served at CHILDS are an excellent example.
