CHASED BY BLACK POSSE

Negro Murderer Near Lynching By Men of His Own Race.

KILLING ON TWENTY SECOND STREET

Robert Whiting, Jr., Shoots Down Walter Flemming, and Escapes. Captured Later by Officers While Posse Follows Wrong Trail.

After he had shot and almost instantly killed Walter Flemming, a negro, at 624 Twenty-second street, early Sunday morning and then made his escape, Robert Whiting, Jr., another negro, was pursued by a posse of a score or more negro men, armed with rifles, shot guns and revolvers, and had he fallen into their hands instead of into those of officers of the local and Bloodfield police forces, he probably would have been lynched.

From evidence adduced at the coroner's inquest, the killing was in cold blood and, as Flemming was a respectable, hard working man, and generally popular among the members of the race, the negro residents of the section where the shooting occurred were highly incensed. They quickly formed a posse to pursue the fleeing negro. Detective Sergeant Henry Bridgers and Officers Parrish, Padgett and Edwards of the local force, had already started out after the man and they were joined later by Officer Whitfield, of the Bloodfield force.

Taking up the trail along Twenty-second street, the officers and the posse followed it to the Ivy farm, on the outskirts of East End. There the officers learned that the man had changed his course and gone toward the Ivy avenue pier. The armed negroes also doubled back and spread out into a sort of skirmish line to scour the fields for the man.

Fugitive Caught at Disney.
When the party had been searching for half an hour without seeing the man, the officers met a negro, who had been held up by Whiting at the point of a gun and relieved of his hat and overalls. This man told the police in what direction the fugitive had gone and they followed quickly.

The officers and negroes made fast time to the Ivy avenue pier and there they learned that Whiting's brother was a caretaker at Disney-on-the-Roads, the home of Dr. H. P. Taylor, near the pier. The officers hurried to the house and met the brother and a woman. Both claimed that they had not seen Whiting, but the officers decided to search the house. Dr. Taylor was absent from home and the officers were compelled to force a window in order to get into the house.

Officer Padgett climbed into the building and found Whiting hiding under a bed. The man still had the loaded revolver with which he had done the shooting.

While this was going on, the posse of negroes reached the scene, but the men made no effort to take the man away from the officers.

Says It Is His Second Murder.
On the way to the station house, Whiting calmly admitted the killing and volunteered the information that this was his second murder.

According to the evidence given before Dr. B. R. Gary, the coroner, and the jury, Whiting and Sarah Battan, a negro, went to Flemming's home early Sunday morning and asked for Flemming. No sooner had the man gotten out on the back porch than the woman began swearing at him. He warned her to stop and when she continued to curse him, Flemming struck her. Whiting told him if he struck the woman again he would kill him.

The woman continued swearing and again Flemming hit her. Then Whiting drew his revolver and fired two shots at Flemming. He then advanced toward the man until the muzzle of the 38-calibre revolver was almost touching the man's chest and then fired the third and fatal shot. Flemming ran about fifteen feet and then dropped, dying within a few minutes.

Whiting followed his victim a few steps and then, pocketing the revolver, he made his escape. Several negro women and men saw the shooting, but none made any attempt to stop Whiting.

In the police court yesterday morning, Whiting's case was continued until today.

Flemming was a young man and unmarried.
