NOTICE!

Certain reports having reached me concerning the prevalence at San Diego, Coronado Beach, and Coronado Tent City of malaria, I desire to make it known that such reports are absolutely unfounded. The malarial mosquito, now known to be the sole carrier of this disease, is positively unknown in this region. During a practice in this immediate vicinity of more than ten years I have yet to see or hear of a single case of any type. (Signed) R. LOHINI, M. D., Pres. RECALLS CONVENTION OF 1872

Only One Crude Sending Machine to Handle Press "Copy."

"Baltimoreans are inclined to think that nothing that ever happened to the city is equal in importance to this convention we're going to have here," said John W. McLean, cashier of the Western Union Telegraph company, "but in its day the Greeley convention, which was held here in 1872, was as big an affair and as important."

Mr. McLean was then a boy, but he had already entered the employ of the telegraph company. "I hadn't even attained to the dignity of operator," he said. "My duty was to handle the press copy and figure the toll—and there was a lot of it to handle. We are accustomed to think that the convention as we know it is a late development, and that newspaper activity and enterprise, too, is a development of the last decade or so, but I can assure you that back there in 1872 they were just as resourceful and covered the field just as thoroughly."

"I remember, for instance, that at that convention, which came here from Cincinnati to settle several debated questions, and convened in Ford's opera house, it was said at the time that more newspapers were receiving news than had ever received it before. Our wires reached to every little hamlet and town in the country, and the news was carried to them all.

"There was in those days a sending machine, called a printer, which could send a number of messages at one time. I forgot all the details, but I imagine that the present Rowland machine is a development of it. That machine, I remember, was the only one we had. All day it was up at the convention hall. The operators would feed the copy into it and a black negro, with a particularly shining face would turn an enormous crank attached to a heavy flywheel. It was pretty hard work, even for him, and I remember that after he had been turning awhile the perspiration would roll off his ebony cheeks and his breath would come in short puffs. "We'd work with that machine at the theater all day long, and at night we'd put it on a wagon and haul it down to our central office and connect it up down there. That was the earliest thing in the whole working of the convention. Even at that time, boy though I was, it struck me as curious that we should have to haul that machine around the way we did. "And—as for working hard—if the operators who will handle the news of this convention work as hard as we did then, they will indeed be unfortunate. I remember that for four days and nights I hardly had a chance to lie down. The whole town was agog with the excitement of the thing. I am sure that nothing that can happen at this convention will surpass the hullabaloo that pervaded the whole place during that famous campaign."

THE CAMPAIGN OF 1888.

A Newspaper Man Had a Narrow Escape While "Digging" for a Story.

In the campaign of 1888, when Harrison was elected, some pretty doubtful political maneuvering was going on in eastern Tennessee. Among the men in the thick of the fight there was Judge Lindsay of Knoxville. National headquarters were in New York, and the commander-in-chief of the republicans there was Matthew S. Quay.

One day an intoxicated politician from South Carolina, who was next to what was going on, walked into Quay's office at headquarters and there met Carson Lake, a newspaper man. Lake thought that if he could get the South Carolinian off into a corner he might talk as freely as his condition seemed to warrant. His surmise proved correct.

The fellow gave Lake just enough of an idea of how things were being carried on in Tennessee to put him on the track for more facts. He went to Quay and Quay bottled up. He wouldn't say a word. Lake told him that he was going to Tennessee, then, to find out for himself, and walked out of the office. Quay immediately sent a message to Judge Lindsay that Lake was on his way to Tennessee and gave him enough of a description of the newspaper man so that he could recognize him. He concluded the message by telling Lindsay to see that the calcium failed to work.

That night, after Quay went to bed, he got to thinking of the message he had sent, and finally got up with a start when he realized how they were used to doing things in eastern Tennessee. He knew that a message from him as their political commander-in-chief meant business to those backwoodsmen and felt that if they did take the message seriously, the chances were that Lake's family never would see him again.

Quay slept little that night, and got up early the next morning to go to his office and send another message to Lindsay. When he walked into headquarters there was Lake. The newspaper man had meant what he said about going to Tennessee as a bluff. Quay was glad to see him, and gave him a fairly good story.

"At least," said the senator, "I'd rather have to fire words at him here than to have those fellows in Tennessee firing bullets at him." Chicago Inter Ocean.

GAVE THANKS FOR KING EDWARD.

Hugh Black, the eminent Scottish theologian and author, now effectually transplanted to New York, relates the following:

"It will be remembered that the coronation ceremonies of Edward VII were postponed because of the king's sudden illness, which developed into an attack of appendicitis. Upon the recovery of the king, thanksgiving services were held in Westminster Abbey. In the Church of England hymn-book there is an Appendix containing hymns for special occasions.

"At the conclusion of the thanksgiving services, a canon, clothed in the solid dignity of a churchman, arose and thus announced the closing hymn: "Let us all join in singing hymn No. 102, "Peace, blessed peace."—in the Appendix."—Hearst's Magazine.

Makes Plump and Rosy Cheeks

Children love ice cream—it's delicious sweetness and coolness. And it is easy to see why. Their natural appetite craves for just such food.

Food? Yes, for ice cream is not, as many think, a mere delicacy—simply something to delight the palate.

It is rich in nutriment—a food that makes the red blood and plump and rosy cheeks.

Good—just as food—at any hour of the day, at any season of the year.

And, value considered, it is one of the least expensive foods you can eat.
