GETTING A DIBE.

(From the Brooklyn Times)

A lively dibe went to Haverly's Theater last night to see Claire and the Fergu Master. He occupied a prominent place in the parquet, where his clothes could be seen, and he attracted more attention than he could have expected, even in his most sanguine moments. His hair was prettily banged, he wore a swallow-tail coat, his vest was out so low that the lower button of that garment and the top button of his English gaiters were not far apart; he wore a bouquet in his button-hole, and his collar was like a long section of stovepipe painted white. In short, he was just too sweet for any use. A dibe seldom drinks anything stronger than sarsaparilla; his brain will not stand it—but he thinks it keeps up appearances to go out between acts and look at some beer or small of a teaspoonful of angelica or watered sherry; so, in order to be considered as a little man, he arose at the end of the second act, and spreading his elbows in English style, he began to sip and feeter up the aisle. The poor creature could have had no idea that by facing the audience he could raise such a commotion. Women in his vicinity began to snicker and men to grin. Half-audible remarks like "There's a dibe!" "Look at that!" "What is it?" were heard, and before the tender young thing had gained the aisle a man began to applaud. Instantly the entire audience caught up the joke, and the building rung to the sound of clapping hands and pounding canes and umbrellas, the gallery denizens shouting, "Hit hit!" and "Get onto his nag!" The poor dibe was almost paralyzed with confusion, and made excellent time for the door. Between the excitement of the oration tendered him and the fierce throttling of his collar, his face was the color of a boiled beef. He waited until the curtain rose before he undertook to return, and then crept in softly on the tips of his toes, but the audience was expecting him, and the play was stopped until the applause that greeted his return was over. He did not leave his seat again during the evening.

GRANT & BOGGS.

The Great General's Early Demonstration of No Business Sense.

(St. Louis Globe Democrat.)

The downfall of Grant & Ward, of New York, recalls to some old citizens of vigorous memories the collapse of Grant & Boggs, of St. Louis. The latter business catastrophe came after the failure in farming. Grant, after throwing up his commission in the army, while serving in Oregon, came out to St. Louis, and there was an understanding between his father and his wife's father that he was to be set up as a farmer. Dent agreed to furnish the farm and old Grant was to stock it. Later on ex-Capt. Grant found himself settled in a log house on the Graysville road. The stock, consisting of a lot of potatoes, came along later in the season. They were unloaded, left on the levee and froze. This was the start in life Grant got as a farmer. Left to his own development of agricultural tastes, he took to hauling in wood and selling it. It was when the farming experiment had proven a failure and Grant had been refused the appointment of engineer, for which he made application to the county court, that he moved to the city and went into the real estate and brokerage business. The firm was Grant & Boggs. The junior partner was a relative of Governor Boggs and also connected with the Dent family. They opened an office on Fine, just above Second, and some property was put in their hands. Capt. Frank McGarraban and other old real estate men remember the firm from attempts at transactions with them and from the utter lack of ideas on business matters which Grant showed. Phil Ferguson, who was then publishing a paper here, tells of going to see Grant about a purchase of a job office which had been put in the firm's hands to sell. He found the senior partner not at the office, but after a search, and when he did so it was with no satisfaction. Although they had the property and it was for sale, Grant was unable to present the terms or the condition of the stuff so that the printer could form any conclusion as to what he was trying to buy or what he was expected to pay for it. In short, the senior partner was without business sense. In a few weeks the real estate and brokerage firm of Grant & Boggs was closed with the past, and the senior went to Galena to join his father in the innery.

THE COMSTOCK MINES.

(From the Reno Gazette.)

W. H. Patton, the well-known mining superintendent, has been giving some interesting facts about some of the mines of the Comstock lode. He says a foot of timber was put into the bonanza for every dollar taken out. They paid $120,000,000, and into the hole left was packed 120,000,000 feet, worth 2 cents a foot. The timbers were laid in rather loosely and occupied about two-thirds of all the space, the one-third being divided up into thousands of cracks and openings in the corduroy, as it is called. The top earth keeps caving in and compresses all this work into one solid mass, and finally the cave reaches the outer crust and the surface settles. By this process twelve-inch timbers are crushed to seven, or nearly half their size. In these dark and distant caverns the wood decays and forms gases, which are frequently heard exploding. The wood is set on fire, and year after year it smoulders and smokes in a slow but terrible way. There are many places in the mines where the smoke works its way out, and can be plainly smelled in the air. The largest body of territory that has been worked out and closed up is in the old bonanza mines, and extends from the 1,200 to the 1,950 levels, and is 1,900 feet long. It was worked out from ten to 200 feet wide and filled with timbers. There are many places in it now on fire, and it will smoulder for centuries unless it gets a draft of air somewhere, when it would break out into a terrible blaze. The gas generated in this way is of the deadliest character. It is confined by air-tight bulkheads, sixty feet thick, of solid timbers. Where the air has a downward this is more necessary than the upward shafts, which carry the gas out into the air instead of down where the men are at work.

TURNED OVER TOO MANY PAGES.

Three or four miles out of East Point, Ga., a negro was taken very sick, a few days ago. A brother of color, who had bought himself a cheap medical treatise, volunteered to cure the patient for four bushels of sweet potatoes. He had not doctored him over three days, however, before the patient was cold in death. A white doctor living in the town happened to be passing and was called in. When he had tasted the medicine, which was in a gillion jug, he asked, "What disease did you doctor for?" "Poll evil, sah." "What! who ever heard of a man having poll evil? That is a horse disease." The other at once opened his book to page 79, and said, "Reckon you'll find it right dah, sah." "Yes," said the doctor, as he thumbed the leaves over, "but the diseases of man are not found in
