PLAIN TALK.

On the result of the election and the causes of it the Missouri Republican, a leading Democratic organ in the West, says that President Grant is re-elected, Horace Greeley is beaten, and the alliance that was expected to overthrow the Republican party, and which, but for one fatal and recognized mistake, would assuredly have accomplished that work, has, for the moment, signally failed. President Grant remains in the White House for a second term; the Liberal revolt against his person has been decisively crushed, and its distinguished leaders made outlaws; and the Administration party seems stronger than ever. The victory belongs to the President more significantly and exclusively than any similar victory ever belonged to a President before, and there is little doubt that he will accept it as such. We believe that a great and grievous wrong has been done the country, not by the re-election of President Grant, but by the immoral agencies by which his re-election was assured; and there is little doubt that there are thousands of intelligent and thoughtful Republicans who, now that their victory is achieved, fear that it has cost more than it is worth. It is not a victory to rejoice at; it has been achieved at the cost of a frightful degradation of the moral sentiment of the country, and even the victors will probably forbear to make any demonstrative exultation over a triumph which they must wish could have been secured by fair means.

We have said that the result would have been different but for one fatal mistake. That fatal mistake was the re-nomination of Mr. Greeley at Baltimore. That re-nomination should never have been made. We argued against it at the time, because we foresaw its evil effect. It did not bring Mr. Greeley a thousand Democratic votes that he would not have received without it, and it repelled half a million Republican votes which he would certainly have received but for it. That Democratic re-nomination not only made him a Democrat, but it made him—using the partisan language of the canvass—a traitor. From the Republican partisan point of view, he had not only suddenly become a traitor, but he had done so to secure a Democratic re-nomination. That was the price of his treason, and telling the Republican masses this was the ignoble and sole task that the Administration leaders had to do. It was this ill-advised endorsement that extinguished the Liberal movement before it had become a revolt—that made it an insurrection of leaders without followers—that left Schurz, Sumner, Trumbull, Greeley, Fenelon, McClure, Palmer, and Julian, as notable a cluster of chiefs as ever raised a standard, unsupported and unencouraged, to fall under the attacks of such inferiors as Cameron, Morton, Butler and Conkling. Before the Baltimore event, a wide and formidable revolt in the Republican party seemed inevitable; after Baltimore, it became impossible. Before Baltimore, it was an independent rebellion supported by the Democratic masses; after Baltimore, it seemed to be a pre-arranged desertion to the Democracy, and for that reason it was permitted to dwindle to the insignificant proportions which it exhibited in the canvass. The Baltimore convention did not intend to kill the movement; but it did effectually kill it.

Referring in the same article to the "passive policy," the Republican continues:

It should have been adopted before the Cincinnati Convention. Had it been so adopted and strictly adhered to, the Liberal opposition to President Grant would have burst into the proportions of a powerful popular movement, and its nominee, whoever he might have been, would have been elected over Grant as certainly and decisively as Brown was elected Governor of Missouri over McClure, in 1870. The movement would have escaped that Democratic proterorate, which, though kindly extended, was disastrous to its development; Liberalism, instead of Democracy, would have been recognized as the antagonist of an obnoxious Administration party; the dissatisfied Republicans in every State—and there are scores of thousands of such, to this day—would have espoused the revolt without losing their Republican character, and without exposing themselves to liability to a charge of treason, and to-day Schurz, Trumbull, Sumner, Palmer, Greeley, Brown, McClure, Curtin and Julian would be the victorious chiefs on the field, instead of Grant and his Pennsylvania and Indiana lieutenants. The Democracy would have lost nothing of what it aimed at, by the sacrifice. All that it sought to accomplish would have been secured, and the Democratic masses would have been duly credited with the success.
