ANCIENT AND MODERN LANGUAGES

Will the so-called dead languages drop out of our high schools and colleges? Certainly the records of work on which the diplomas are being awarded give a little less space every year to these subjects. Latin still has a large place, but Greek has almost dropped out of sight. As a practical business proposition it does not seem much use for the ordinary boy to study Greek today. French and German help him to keep closer in touch with the outward world of modern life. A business man needs no Greek in his newspaper, he is never called on to write a letter in either that language or Latin. At the same time, when a student drops the classics, there are certain losses that are not made good. If he studies the old languages, particularly Greek, he follows the thought of certain great philosophers which must enlarge his conception of life.

The classic world emphasized ideas that are badly needed today. The old philosophers dwelt upon the obligation of the citizen to the state, obedience to law, the necessity of a temperate, well rounded balance of all the elements necessary to successful life. It was a healthy minded philosophy. The student's thought is filled with noble images of heroism, self sacrifice, and civic spirit. The student of the modern languages spends his time very largely on trivial plays, novels, and conversation exercises. Whose philosophy is not elevating or ennobling. He is closer to the current of daily life, but has received no inspiration of spirit.

It is of course useless to turn back the educational tide. The business man must study the aspects of life that bring him the closest to the modern world. But American life needs men of thought as well as men of action. Those who aspire to be writers, preachers, teachers, can not afford to neglect the noble ideals of the wonderful old classics. The yacht Resolute won yesterday's race with the Vanitie off Sandy Hook. John D. Rockefeller arrived at Cleveland from Tarrytown, N. Y., to spend the summer at his Cleveland residence, Forest Hill.
