All is Calm in Post Office. Sometime last spring we are informed there arose a controversy between John Jennings the rural carrier on Route No. 2 on the one side and Henry Heintzelman and Roy Strange, postal clerks, on the other.

Jennings had been using a certain tire on his automobile which he considered a good tire. Heintzelman and Strange said his tire was no good and that the one they used was by far the better one. Quite a discussion arose and finally Heintzelman and Strange, to show that they had implicit faith in their tire offered before witnesses that if Jennings would purchase two tires, one of his own favorite and one of theirs, put them on at the same time and run both until they gave out that they would pay him five cents for each day that his tire outlasted theirs if he would agree to do the same if their tire outlasted his. He at once agreed and two tires were purchased and ran all summer, but along early this fall the Heintzelman-Strange tire had a blow out which put it out of the running and the Jennings tire ran for ninety-five days longer before it gave out. Jennings at once applied for his bonus which amounted to four dollars and seventy five cents. The losers disclaimed any intention to pay it as they claimed the entire matter was a joke. Jennings insisted adamant until Christmas day Jennings said that he was pretty much peevish at their refusal to pay an honest debt and that he hated to go through Christmas feeling in that humor and told them that if they would pay the debt that he would add a quarter to it and turn it over to a committee of postal employees for the purpose of buying a treat for the entire office force. The other fellows agreed and on Monday morning the money was handed to McCauley of the city carriers and waiting of the rural carriers and the money was invested in ice cream and cake which was heartily enjoyed by the entire postal force and peace at last reigns among the boys.
