JUDGE KIMBALL'S RETURN

Prisoners Got Short Shrift at the Bar of Justice. FINES GIVEN NEARLY ALL

Michael Riley Held Up Pedestrians and Got Fifteen Days—Mamie Johnson's First Offense—She Was Allowed to Depart Unmolested—Two Men Fought for Whisky

There were several changes at the police court today. After an absence of six weeks Judge Kimball returned, and again donned the ermine of his office. As he lounged in his big easy chair behind the stalwart mahogany desk he commented on the absence of Mr. James L. Pugh, Jr., the prosecuting attorney.

At the same time a train bore his honor to the scenes of his labors, another carried Mr. Pugh to his famous chicken farm in Pennsylvania.

His honor, after greeting the newspaper men and the bailiffs promptly, said, "Where is Mr. Pugh today?" "Absent, your honor," said Keady. "He's on his vacation."

"Gone, too," replied the bailiff. He then called the first prisoner, Charles Henry. Henry comes from District, and has been visiting in the North. On his way southward he became stranded, and, unfortunately for him, asked for assistance last night from several passers-by.

He was apprehended by Policeman Rapp, who, with kindness of heart, said a good word to the judge about his prisoner. "If Henry's promise to go immediately to his home in Richmond, the judge accepted his personal recognizances."

Michael Riley, in an attempt to recuperate his worn financial condition, held up people going to and from the Baltimore and Ohio depot last night for money to buy drinks.

"If your honor lets me off this time," said Michael, "I'll never be here again." His honor refused and gave Michael fifteen days.

Mamie Johnson, a colored woman who has never been arrested before, was charged by Policeman J. R. Evans with disorderly conduct.

DIED FROM A BROKEN HEART

Mrs. Jacob Christian Quickly Followed Her Husband to the Grave. He Dropped Dead August 24 and Her Wish to Die Was Granted a Week Later.

If there can be such a thing as a broken heart, Mrs. Jacob Christian, colored, lies dead from it at her late residence, No. 1246 Madison street northwest. Mrs. Christian was the wife of Jacob Christian, who will be remembered as the waiter, who, as he was about to leave his leave his place of employment, Osborne & Hubert's, corner of Seventh and G streets, on the night of August 24, dropped dead of heart disease. Mr. and Mrs. Christian were married in this city twenty-three years ago, and, saving their one regret that they were childless, there was never the slightest cloud in their domestic horizon.

When her husband was lying dead in his little parlor, some one inconsiderately took Mrs. Christian, without warning her, down to see the body. She immediately fell into convulsions, and afterward was taken with nervous prostration, from which, however, she was able to get away.

Day after day Mrs. Christian moaned and sobbed on her bed, saying in broken tones to her attendants that how the last tie which bound her to life had been cut, she too wished to be taken away.

Finally Monday last, just one week after the death of her husband, her wish was granted, and she passed peacefully away about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Her remains, with a calm smile of contentment still on her face, lie in the parlor of the small but well-kept home, where it has been visited by both white and colored friends.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Christian were born in slavery, she in Bladenburg, Md., he in Richmond, Va. They came to this city just at the close of the war and met at the home of Mrs. Christian's father, Charles Beckett, who was for many years steward of the Washington jail.

CALLS UP A FAMOUS CASE

Action Brought by Lily Alys Godfrey in New York. ACKLEN-ROSSER INCIDENT

The Plaintiff in the Present Suit Was Once a Famous Society Belle Here—She Was Beautiful, Gay and Adventurous—A Duel on Her Account Barely Averted.

The action brought by Lily Alys Godfrey, of this city, against Stephen A. Dotson, of New York city, for the alleged forging of letters to certain property in Washington and Belmont, Me., as told in the Evening Times recently, again brings before the public a woman who was once one of the most conspicuous characters at the National Capital.

Miss Godfrey is still well known here, where she has resided nearly all her life. She is now something like forty-five years of age, though her most interesting episodes took place two decades ago.

Twenty years ago Miss Lily Alys Godfrey, as she was wont to style herself, was a society leader among the Congressional and official set. She was very beautiful, and dressed exquisitely. At receptions, in drawing-rooms or ball-rooms Alys, as her intimate friends called her, was always adorned with a profusion of diamonds and brilliant gems, the gifts of statesmen and those high in the councils of the nation.

She was the gayest of the gay; fond of excitement and late hours. Half the Representatives in Congress and nearly all the Senators Mrs. Godfrey could name by their given names. She was a familiar figure about the grounds, and was always the center of attraction. Whether in the restaurant, reception room or gallery, she was ever surrounded by a group of solons who neglected their duties to converse with this charming woman.

Congressman Benjamin Willis of New York was the first to see Mrs. Godfrey, and this afforded her a passport into inner circles. Among those who basked in the sunshine of her smile were Gen. J. L. Rosser and Congressman J. B. Acklen of Louisiana.

Gen. Rosser was an ex-Confederate officer, who had gained golden laurels in fighting for the lost cause. He was tall, swarthy, with a proud military bearing and a commanding presence. Acklen represented the Third Louisiana district. He was handsome and wealthy, yet insolent and high spirited. His family had recovered a large indemnity from the United States government for property destroyed during the war. Upon this he was flourishing. He carried things with a high hand, was lavish and imprudent with the idea that whatever he sought to accomplish must be done, regardless of consequences.

The first session of the Fourth-fifth Congress was drawing to a close. It was on the night of Tuesday, June 18, 1878, when Gen. Rosser accompanied Miss Godfrey to Welcker's fashionable establishment, which was the famous resort for society leaders.

LIFELONG FRIENDS FOUGHT. They engaged a private dining room. Acklen was there also with a lady friend. Glasses clinked filled with ruby wine. There were edibles and drinkables of all kinds, and everything went as gayly as could be until the hours were waxing late. All the parties had been freely and were more or less under the influence of liquor.

Rich Deposits Every where in British Guiana. London, Sept. 3.—The St. James Gazette says that Sir Augustus Henning, the new governor of British Guiana, made a note of the disputed northwestern districts of Guiana during the month of August, steaming up the Barima river to Acaza Bica, thence to Arakaka. He found the output of gold from the Barima mine was increasing, and that the whole country was rich with gold deposits. When Gov. Henning and his party visited the frontier station at Amacura they were objects of great interest to the Venezuelans on the opposite side of the river.
