HONORARY EAST.

It was quite lawful to see Lieut. Doane's pup. It was also easy; that was because he was a "griffin," the greenest kind of a "griffin." Nature had cut him out for an innocent boy, and his mother had never allowed the pattern to get out of shape. It was not particularly witty to call him "the Cherub," but it was deemed appropriate.

Cherub, but it was deemed appropriate. Also at Hokeypoorey—that's where the regiment was stationed when he came out to join—things were different from what they were at Ballycumjerry, in dear old Ireland.

But he took his troubles as lightly as an Irish hunter takes a stone fence; the result was that the soldiers were kept busy finding new things for him to discover.

"He'll never be a boy till he slays a tiger," said Capt. Mahone. "The boy is forever talking about his shooting and how he'd like to lay out Master Stripes."

"That means, I suppose," drawled Herbert, "that we'll have to get a tiger for him to slay."

It seemed a ridiculous coincidence that Buldo, the shikari, should turn up the very next day with a strutting tale of devastation from a man-eater. Doane himself would have given as a bullock, shah, and as bloodthirsty as a head-hunting hillman, was eating up men and cattle beyond all count.

It was like getting up a lottery on the gymkhana grounds, it was so easy and so easy do. Buldo would arrange for a kill, for a bait, out at the ten kos place, and they would go that night and be ready for business in the early morning. Herbert and Doane were this tiger, getting up for his chota haaree at daylight, and surely might the shah bag him just when the crows began to call the breaking day.

Herbert might have told him about it; but then "the Cherub" was always jumping at conclusions, like a true-born Irishman, and paddling about in the Mulligatawny in consequence.

To the astonishment of everybody Vaseline did not start in the "Hokeypoorey Cup"; that was the open event for the first day.

"I'll take him!" shouted Herbert, rushing across eagerly to where "the Cherub" stood. "Here! You fellows heard Doane offer to sell the horse at 800 rupees, didn't you? Well, I don't want to sell him to you, but if you stick me to it you can take him just as he is. Mind, I don't give any guarantee about him in any shape or form."

It was a glorious opportunity. "The Cherub" was always doing stupid things, but this was the climax. Capt. Herbert gave him the I O U, and the horse was his.

"Mind," said the "Cherub," "you'll have to send up for him, for you've taken delivery of him now. I'm not going to send up for him in the morning."

"You'd better send up tonight," said "the Cherub," in a quiet, drawing sort of way.

"Why can't he stop there till morning?" asked the captain. "He's a good horse, and I'll be glad to take up the offer."

"Because he's dead," gently remarked "the Cherub." "And I don't like to have a dead horse in my stable so long."

An ominous silence fell over the latter's room.

"The Cherub," feeling that perhaps a little explanation was necessary, said:

"He put his foot in a hole when I was giving him a final gallop this evening, and snapped his leg like a pipestem. I didn't mean to sell him, thought, he added, with that same tantalizing drawl, until Capt. Herbert rushed me into it. I was just going to tell you fellows to withdraw him from the lotteries when I came in, but I was too late to stop him being put up to Lucknow, in February, to run among the 'good' ones."

Doane was training Vaseline himself, which was proof positive that the pony must be a cracker if he could win in any company with training such as he was among the "good" ones.

Of course, as there weren't many strangers coming to the small meet at Hokeypoorey, of a necessity the regiment was a house divided against itself, each brother officer a bit up his sleeve, and a hopeful idea that somebody or another he would come out on the right side on setting day over the lotteries.

It was Herbert's pony, Curry Boy, that was dead lame the day before the races commenced.

"The Cherub" saw him limping as he came back from his morning gallop.

and in consequence laid a tidy few of the depreciated rupees against his winning the race he was favored for.

Herbert might have told him about it; but then "the Cherub" was always jumping at conclusions, like a true-born Irishman, and paddling about in the Mulligatawny in consequence.

To the astonishment of everybody Vaseline did not start in the "Hokeypoorey Cup"; that was the open event for the first day.
