THE DAILY DISPATCH.

AN IRISH ANECDOTE.

Once upon a time, a long time ago, when giants were plenty in Ireland as fleas on a toad, there lived in the county of Wick, a man of the name of Barney O'Connell, who was a very fine fellow, and was well known, and acknowledged by seven feet high and made in his own country.

Now report spoke of a certain giant in Scotland who was laboring under the like grief, and for precisely the same cause;

therefore, Barney, after consulting his friends on the subject, sent a challenge to the Scotch giant, to "come over to Ireland and get the conceit taken out of himself."

After the due time the bearer of the challenge returned with word that it had been accepted, and further stated that he was advised to inform Barney, that he had better make his will, get his coffin made, &c., as he, that he was about to encounter, never left his work half done.

"Did you see him?" asked Barney. "Faith, an' I did," said the messenger. "What is he like?" interrogated the giant.

"Faith, Barney, avic, he's like any thing at all but mortal being." "How big is he?" said Barney, looking any thing but pleased at the description of his rival.

"How big is he, did you say? Faith, he's as big as the ould tower furin' the door, an' a head an' shoulders like Father M'Gurney's bull, an' by all accounts he'll ait you alive."

Barney began to feel rather uncomfortable at the prospect of his fate, and straightway went to consult his wife, as to what was to be done in the event of his rival proving to be such as his messenger had represented.

While they were thus engaged, one of the children came running in, and exclaimed: "Daddy, come to the door and see the great big man that's coming down the hill!"

Barney peeped through the chinks of the door, and to his great terror, saw the monster. A look was enough to satisfy him that his messenger had not exaggerated his account of him, and turning to his wife he said, "Shela, jewel, I'm itt alive for sartin'! Here comes the Scotch beast to drum your poor Barney."

Shela heard the approach of the coming foe, and her lord's utter inability to wage war with one so far superior in strength and size, she concluded that it was only by some piece of woman's wit that her husband could escape from the affair without dishonor, and accordingly she gently lifted the child out of the cradle, and depositing it on the bed of the inner room, made the father get in his place, and covering him with a quilt, gently seated herself by the cradle.

After a few moments, in walks the cause of all the disturbance, and demanded an interview with the giant. Shela, after motioning with her hand for him to keep quiet, walked gently across the floor to where he stood, and in an undertone told him Barney had gone out in the woods. The giant informed her that he intended writing his return. "Very well," said Shela, "only don't make a word of notice for the life that is in you; for there's nothing making him more furious than to hear the child cry when he comes home."

By this time the giant had seated himself on a bench and was quietly surveying the apartment; but when his eyes rested on the cradle, with a look of unutterable astonishment, he asked what was in it. "In it," cried Shela, "don't you see that it is the child that's in it? An' Heaven help you if you wake him; the craythur didn't get a wink of sleep last night with the two back teeth he's cutting." The giant, with a look of terror and astonishment, asked what size the father was? "Faith an' I can't tell you, for I never measured him, but that garson (pointing to the cradle) when the father is angry, runs and hides himself in one of his boots." "Laird save us!" exclaimed the giant; "I winna mind waiting the noo lassee, I maun be gaun, good morning; and so saying he took to his heels and never thought himself safe until he got among the hills of his own country."

CONGRESS--THURSDAY. SENATE--Messrs. Dodge and Walker presented several petitions praying for the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. Hamlin reported a resolution in favor of printing 1,500 additional copies of the report upon the mail steamer contracts. Agreed to.
