A THRILLING NARRATIVE.

The Murdered Bridegroom.

(From Bentley's Miscellany.)

CONCLUDED.

Another circumstance requires a passing reference. I have frequently requested that "William" would come to see her, and she had longed for the attachment which had existed between her husband and his widow. To every invitation she would reply that she was not at home. He would often say to himself, "What a woman!"
"What a woman!"

When evening came, and Mr. Pemberton, under the name of the inn door, Liaume was seen, wrapped in his catamore, coming from the market town. The distance to reach the principal entrance to the hotel would require a detour of at least two miles, while the back gate opened upon the road that William took. There was no lodge, but Liaume vaulted to gain admission easily and carefully lock the gate after him. The scene that followed was thus described by one of the strangers.

On reaching the back entrance of the park, Mr. Pemberton unlocked the gate, and when he had secured it, he turned to his guests and said, "This is the first time I have had the honor to receive you at Mount Harze." The strangers bowed, while a voice that seemed to emanate from a hollow and distinct tones, "The first?" A gun exploded—Mr. Pemberton screamed and fell—the strangers' horses went on at a side—the rider managed to keep his saddle, while the other was roughly dismounted. The fallen horseman, rolled into the ditch, and there, in mortal agony, he viewed the denouement of the tragedy.

A tall man wrapped in a frieze great-coat, stepped leisurely from the back of the hedge, and quietly approached the body. He looked at the dead man, and then at the bloodless horse. "One barrel did the business," he remarked, "the other was prepared for consequence and assassination, for the barrels had been shortened by a foot. The murderer gazed on the dead body for a minute, but his hand never approached the pockets of his victim, except when he drew a gold watch from the bag, muttered it was "half-past seven," and quietly returned the time-piece. The murderer being done to his satisfaction, he led a horse into the avenue, unlocked and refastened the gate, and rode off leisurely. Half dead with fear, the stranger listened to the horsetramp, and crept cautiously from the ditch—He shuddered as he looked at the body, for on the breast of the dead man a paper, written in hand, contained the single sentence of "Blood for blood!"

"Lucy R—", in widow's weeds, was sitting in her drawing room. The gloom of twilight accorded with her "soul's sadness," for the period was approaching when a being, or phantom long before it saw the light, was to claim a mother's care. Her past was faithful to recall, her future fearful to look forward to.
What should she do, when a widow at twenty—Wrapped in sombre meditation, she did not hear the opening door, until, moving across the light, a tall figure arrested her attention, when standing within two yards of her.

"Who are you?" demanded the startled mourner.

"William Halligan, lady, come to bid you an eternal farewell!" A deep, low voice responded—

"Brother of him in whom every feeling in this young heart was centered, and ever will be, I give you a widow's welcome. Sit down, William."

"Lady, I dare not, for time is precious!"
"How often have I sent for you, William?"
"And think you, lady, that a whisper from you would have brought me here at midnight? Bound, however, by a secret vow, I dared not see you until I came to-night to say adieu!"

"Where are you going, William?"
"That, Heaven and accident only can decide.
The money which he who was born to be rich, was months ago transmitted to America, and there I shall claim it." "I need protection, William." That hardened wretch—he who robbed me of my husband—rode past my window yesterday."

"He will never repeat the offence," returned Long William, calmly. "But time hurries forward, and upon a few minutes with me life and death may depend. Should the promised infant prove a boy, give him this, as a dear memento, and he took a gun from beneath his great coat, and laid it on the table. "Tell him that a cross is filed deeply in the barrel that speed—"

"Whom—in the name of heaven?" exclaimed the lady, in alarm.

"The slayer of his father!" And now, farewell forever!"

He fell upon his knees, caught the lady's hand in his, and covered it with kisses. A low, shrill whistle was heard beneath the window.

"It is the signal. May heaven bless and comfort you! Lady, farewell forever!" Before the words were heard distinctly, he vanished as he entered. All knew that the murderer of George Pemberton was Liaume Vad-dah, and in a wild community.

"With whom revenge is virtue," his memory is still handed down as one who did the State some service." He sought the woods of Allin, led a hunter's life, and died in an Indian wigwam.

It is only necessary to add that the family of the unscrupulous dæmonist have been extinct for thirty years, while the descendant of the
