My Heart and My Husband

Adele Garrison's New Phase

Revelations Of a Wife

The Way Madge Enlisted Marion's Help and Met Jack and Katherine.

Mother Graham, her daughter and her son-in-law, went for a drive with Dicky in the early afternoon. A hastily whispered word in Harriet's Braithwaite's ear outlined my plans for the afternoon and insured them all being on the veranda when Jack and Katherine should arrive. After they had gone I flew around with Katie, putting glowing autumn flowers in all the rooms. My father suspected nothing, for he knows my weakness for flowers everywhere. Then I dressed Junior in his very best baby togger and left him in Katie's charge to the great delight of both of them. Marion I took with me, partly because I knew of the child's great affection for Katherine, born of the devoted care the little nurse had given Marion's grandmother in her last illness, partly because of Katie's ultimatum, delivered shortly after the departure of the family for their drive.

"Fun ting sure, Meesis Graham," she said decisively, "nutting doings of dot Marion and dot babee left togelder by me. Me, I take vun or I take oder vun, no togelder. Dot babee he joust have hees clothes all rumped opp if dot Marion she stay, play by heem. I no mean dot Marion not goot kid"—magnificently—"but she love dot babee so much, she no can keep her hands off heem."

Heroically I repressed a smile, for the weakness she criticized in Marion was one she displayed herself in season and out of season. But I knew her pride in Junior's appearance would prevent her hugging him unduly before the guests came, and silently agreed with her that Marion was better off with me. The child was wild with delight when on the way to the station in the car I explained that the "Auntie Katherine" she adored was coming, and that the arrival of the visitors would be a surprise which she should have the honor of announcing. Marion had been undeniably lonesome since the departure of her mother for New York, and I felt an additional responsibility for her comfort because Lillian's errand was on my account exclusively.

Marion's Question.

"Oh—oh!" she exclaimed. "Just to think of seeing Auntie Katherine again! I think she's the sweetest woman in the world, next to mother and you," she amended loyally. "You know"—this with the most confidential air in the world—"I tried awful hard to like Uncle Jack, but I just couldn't, somehow, although I s'pose when folks get married you ought always to like the husband or wife just as well as you like the other one, oughtn't you, Auntie Madge?" "I don't believe relatives-in-law generally think that, Marion," I said dryly. "At any rate I wouldn't worry about it one bit if I were you. Just go ahead and love Auntie Katherine best. She needs all our love."

"Just Watch Me."

I pronounced a mental imprecation upon my stupidity. "No, no, dear," I said earnestly, and that Jack was not "bad" to Katherine in any sense that Marion could understand, and saved my conscience with the thought. "But Auntie Katherine isn't well, and she has been worrying over Uncle Jack's health for so long that I'm afraid she isn't quite happy. But you must never speak of it. I added impressively, "even to her. Just love her a lot. That's what she likes best."

"Just watch me," the child returned earnestly, with one of the expressions she has picked up from Katie, and when we had reached the station and greeted Jack and Katherine descending from the train she made good her boast by enveloping Katherine joyously in a "big bear hug," kissing her repeatedly and caroling over and over, "Oh, my darling Auntie Katherine, I'm so glad you're here."

Jack kissed my forehead perfunctorily and shook hands with Marion when the child had released Katherine in the same almost formal way. There was a look in his eyes which I remembered of old when he was annoyed. "I didn't understand that you had guests," he said.

For a moment I was panic-stricken, not at the thought of explaining Marion's presence—I could easily do that—but at the remembrance that like all well-meaning planners, I had omitted a vital precaution of telling Marion the guests were not to know of other visitors.

If the child should betray the presence of the Braithwaite's at the house I did not doubt that Jack would take the next train back to town.

Next—"Why Madge Was Glad One Question Remained Unspoken on Jack's Lips."

FOWLER COMING TO SPEAK HERE

Secretary of Montana Development Association May Address Merchants Thursday.

Merchants of Great Falls and surrounding territory will hear a message from the Montana Development association when they hold their meeting in the palm room of Hotel Rainbow on next Thursday evening. The development association will be represented, it is expected, by C. W. Fowler, the secretary. Secretary Almon LeFebvre of the local association has not yet received the positive acceptance of Secretary Fowler but he has indirect promises of the acceptance and he feels warranted in announcing that Mr. Fowler will be present and speak. The meeting will also hear reports on the state convention of merchants at Lewistown. F. J. Perra and Allen McLean, the representatives of the local association, will make their report at this gathering. There will be other speakers and Secretary LeFebvre announces that the meeting will be provided with other features sure to interest not only the Great Falls contingent but all merchants in this section of the state. It has been announced that there would be a dinner served but this will not occur. It is believed by the committee that the members would prefer to merely have this a get-together session without a spread.

Demand for Teachers Greater Than Supply

Inquiries about positions in rural schools have been coming into the federal employment service within the last few days according to E. J. Fitzpatrick, secretary of the bureau. But the demand for teachers is greater. From Virginia City comes a call for 25 rural teachers at salaries ranging from $100 to $130 a month, and 20 grade school teachers at $110 to $125 per month. There is also a big demand for skilled labor, particularly machinists and boiler-makers. Thirty car repairers are wanted at from 67 cents to 72 1/2 cents per hour.

FIRE AT HAWKS HOME.

Old Landmark Gone as "Cascade Bank" Sign Rubbed Out

An old landmark passed from the view Thursday when workmen for the Great Falls Building & Loan association removed the words "Cascade Bank" from the plate glass of the business room at the corner of Second street north and Central avenue. Those words had appeared on the windows and doors there for a little more than a quarter of a century. In their place will be painted the corporate name of the institution which now has its home there. The Cascade bank was recently consolidated with the American Bank & Trust company.

Funniest Farce Comedy on Stage Is Coming to Grand Next Sunday

Patrons of the Grand opera house will have opportunity on Sunday evening of seeing that uproariously funny farce comedy "Baby Mine" which has been a hit of the last few seasons and never seems to wane in popularity. The play will be presented by a competent company and its former favor in this city insures it a good house on this visit. This unmistakable hit of two continents comes direct from the metropolis where it reigned king of mirth for over a solid year at Daly's theater. The company carries a complete scenic and electrical equipment the same as it has done in all of the larger cities from coast to coast, and across the Atlantic. Every character in the play is of a distinctive nature and the best artists have been secured by the producers to portray them.

Directors Meet Fails to Bring Out Quorum

What had been intended for a business session of the directors of the Commercial club Thursday afternoon turned out to be an informal session at which numerous matters were discussed but no formal conclusions reached. Several of the members of the board were out of the city and the meeting was one or two short of a quorum, but those present took occasion to talk over many things that must be settled at an early sitting of the board. There will be a meeting within a few days when the things which have now been put into shape for prompt action will be disposed of and numerous other subjects will be considered.
