REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

Why Did Alfred Durkee Whisper One Question to Lella?

"Isn't that the train?" Lella Fairfax lifted her pretty eyes from the sewing on her lap as she spoke, then flushed crimson at the teasing glance I flung at her.

"I fancy it is," I retorted coolly, "but I don't see why it should interest you. You'd far better put your mind on that hem of your stitches will show through the crepe, and then, what will your future mother-in-law say?"

"What an ogress you are!" she pouted saucily. "But I'm not going to let even a threat like that spoil my meeting Alf. Come along. You're sat on a cushion and sewed a fine seam long enough for one afternoon. And Dicky doesn't like to play gooseberry."

"You mean you don't like to have him," I put away the blouse I was embroidering, and went to my closet for my hat and coat, for the walk to the afternoon train to meet Dicky and Alfred Durkee appealed to me. We never went quite to the station unless we took the car and motored down for them, but met them on the beautiful old road leading from the station, which is one of the delights of Marin.

"No Hasn't Any!" Lella made a little moue at me in the mirror before which she was adjusting her hat with painstaking care. I smiled amusedly at her earnest reflection.

"I suppose if that chapeau were one-sixteenth of an inch out of plumb Alfred would break the engagement, wouldn't he?" I asked solemnly. She tied her veil hurriedly—she is one of the few girls to whom veils are especially becoming, and as she naturally is perfectly aware of the fact, she generally wears one—and turned to me with an appealing little smile.

"I suppose I am a fuss budget," she said ruefully. "But you know how fastidious Alfred is, and what a careless fly away I am. If I'm not going to annoy him terribly after we are married I shall have to begin to practise beforehand."

"What particular foible is Alfred preparing to banish so that he won't annoy you?" I asked slyly, then mentally anathematized myself for the words. I have resolved so many times since the preparations for Lella Fairfax's wedding began that I would keep from voicing to the gentle Virginia girl my disapproval of the attitude she is unconsciously adopting toward the man she is to marry.

Despite her gay sauciness and the good common sense which I know her to possess, I can see that she is predestined from her very nature and training to be the patient Griselda type of look of the finest chaps in the world, yet he is no different from other men in the masculine tendency to tread heavily upon a doormat when one is spread invitingly before his feet. However, I have striven to impress upon my soul and tongue the fate of meddlers, with, I am afraid, but indifferent success.

But I need not have worried as to the effect of any words of mine. Lella's face as she turned it toward me wore a look of astonished incredulity.

"Why, he hasn't any!" she exclaimed so earnestly that I quickly dodged out of the door under pretense of haste in order to keep her from seeing the amused smile I couldn't repress.

But she was quick enough of perception to sense the smile she could not see, and she ran lightly down the stairs after me, slipping her hand through my arm as we went out of the hall door.

"I suppose you think I'm an awful idiot," she pouted, "but 'fess up now. Could you see any faults in Dicky three weeks before you were married?"

Even as I fell into step with her my thoughts flew back to the cynical whisperings of the little mocking devil who sometimes torments me, and who tinged even the wild happiness of my betrothal with distrust of the possibilities of a blissful marriage.

Because of my mother's sad experience I had been able to see clearly how unsuited Dicky and I were to each other, to realize his faults as well as my own. Despite all this I had thrown all my theories to the winds and married him impetuously, unreasoningly, but then I had remained with me a certain cynicism which had helped to balance me in those early days.

"Did You Tell Her." But I had no intention of confiding to Lella the heart secrets of that early time, nor of making her self-conscious in the presence of her lover as she might become if I told her the truth about my own experience. Therefore I answered her lightly.

"Nary a fault. But there'll be two or three seen in us if we don't hurry. The boys will be almost home before we get to the boulevard."

But it was Alfred alone whom we met half-way to the station.

"The Dicky-bird is being gobbled up alive by that awful old bore, Snithers, he said slyly. "I couldn't stop to rescue him, being other important business on hand," he smiled tenderly at Lella, "but he gave me a glance that meant, 'Send me wife along quickly.'"

"Machavel!" I ghebed, as I left them. A low-toned question from Alfred, which I knew he did not mean me to hear, came to my ears, brought by the wind which was blowing toward me:

"Did you tell her?"

NEXT—"The thoughts that troubled Madge as she went to meet Dick."
