

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adele Garrison's New Phase of...

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

What Maj. Grantland Came to Ask Madge

My mother-in-law's prediction did not come true. It was not one hour but six which whirled by before Maj. Grantland's big car came up our driveway.

I knew that he had stopped at Mrs. Durkee's home shortly after the little woman had departed in such high dudgeon at our disinclination to agree with the wedding bouquet scheme. That it, after all, had turned out to be Dicky's instead of the young officer's, was something which I was sure "Her Fluffiness" did not know. And then Maj. Grantland did not come over, but dashed past the house as if he were going to a fire. I made up my mind that our little neighbor had resolved to take us at our word and leave us bouquetless as far as Hugh Grantland was concerned.

I found myself worrying absurdly over the situation, even though the rush of last things to which I was attending. My father, who always appears to have an unlimited fund of that elastic and elusive commodity known as "inside information," had warned us that we must get our trunks off early if we expected them to arrive in any season, also that we must carry all the things most necessary in our bags.

With the prospect of no trunks for days it was a seemingly endless task to decide what things were most vitally necessary for baby's comfort and my own creditable appearance at the wedding. I packed and repacked suitcases and traveling bags, even tucking away such light articles as handkerchiefs and silk hose in the crevices of the box which held the hat I was to wear at Leila's wedding.

Left Alone.

I was femininely inconsistent enough to wonder if my mother-in-law and I were to be the only women without bouquets at the wedding, even to feel resentment toward Maj. Grantland for taking our refusal for granted without even an effort to change our decision. Then my irritation swerved to little Mrs. Durkee, who might have known—I told myself hotly—that I was only refusing the professed courtesy because I dreaded Dicky's displeasure and his mother's nagging.

Thankful indeed was I that there was no one to disturb either my packing or my absurd worrying, which was complicated by the certainty that Dicky, despite his dislike of the young officer, would be furious when he found that the scheme which he himself had devised had been partly spoiled by his wife and mother.

Dicky had departed on the noon train to attend to some last things at the studio, and my father had unexpectedly taken the same train with an air of having discovered something of the utmost importance which had to be attended to at once. My mother-in-law was busy with her own packing, which threatened to be still unfinished when the train whistle should sound. Katie and Jim were efficiently preparing the house for shutting up, and I was left to my own unsatisfactory self for company.

A Long "Minute."

I was in no very placid mood, therefore, when Katie dashed up to my room with a little more than her usual strenuousness and excitedly announced: "Oh, Misses Graham! Dot Maj. Grantland he here in dot great, beeg car, vant to know if he can see you joost vun leetle minute."

The young officer's wonderful high-powered car has always greatly impressed Katie's flamboyant imagination, and I have always suspected that she secretly applied her yardstick of romance obtained from her beloved "movies" to the very infrequent appearance she had freely translated the young officer's request I was sure, and had to smile in spite of my irritation at her bright interested eyes looking excitedly at me.

"Tell him I will be down in a minute," I answered sedately. But it was almost five minutes before I finally descended the stairs.

For an unaccountable fit of shyness of reluctance to see Hugh Grantland, had suddenly seized me, and had shaken me until I found my feet trembling like a frightened schoolgirl. Because of Dicky's ridiculous jealousy I had been extremely careful to be sure that some third person was present whenever I chanced to encounter him. That he had been similarly considerate I guessed, and it had come with a sudden, subtle fit of absurd significance to me that this was the first time I had seen him alone for many months.

But I finally nerved myself to go down stairs and put all my nerve strength into the effort to greet him with just the right shade of perfunctory cordiality.

"This is indeed a pleasure, Maj. Grantland," I said, holding out my hand in greeting. "Not quite unexpected, however, for Mrs. Durkee has already told us of your wonderful thoughtfulness."

"What—oh? Oh! About the flowers?" he stammered. Yes, yes, of course. But, as it happens, I have come about a very different errand just now. Tell me is it true that you have no drawing room for your southern trip?"

ACCUSES HUSBAND OF BEING CRUEL

Mrs. Ruth Wilson Relates Story of Mistreatment at Hands of Defendant.

Cruel and inhuman treatment is alleged against the defendant in a divorce action filed in district court Friday by Ruth Wilson against Thomas L. Wilson, to whom she was married at Helena on November 10, 1913. Mrs. Wilson alleges that her husband has frequently beaten and kicked her and that he once threw dishes at her and drove her from the house in the night. She accuses him further of being drunk most of the time, of continuously harassing her with vile and abusive language, and of gambling away their joint savings.

The Wilsons have two minor children and the wife asks that she be awarded their custody and that the defendant be required to pay $80 a month alimony.

DEFENDANTS APPEAL JUSTICE COURT CASE.

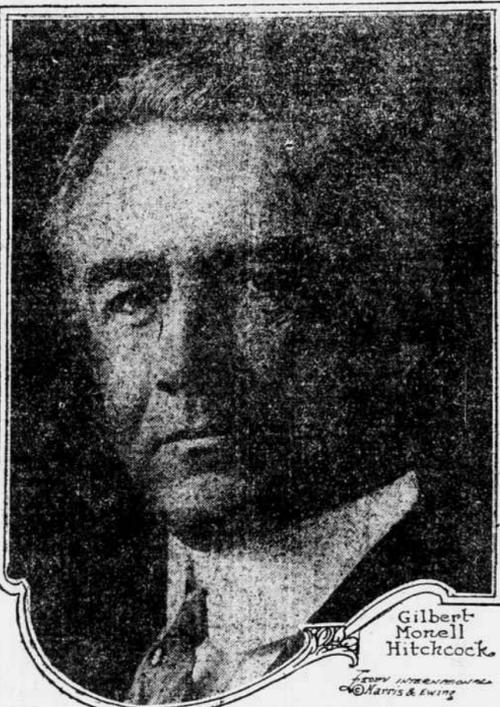

Appeal from the judgment returned in the Lamere justice court has been taken by the defendant in the case of the Goodridge-Coff Lumber company against the Treasure State Realty company and W. A. Wideman. The plaintiff company demanded a judgment for $201, and was given a verdict for $222 in the lower court.
