FARMERS ARE ASKED TO HELP IN DRAWING NEW LAW OUTLINES

Montana Development Ass'n Seeks Co-Operation of Farm Bureaus; Proposes Conference.

Billings, Nov. 21.—W. A. Selvidge, president of the Montana Development association, has made public a letter written to W. A. Harlan, president of the Montana State Federation of Farm Bureaus, inviting the convening of a conference of farm bureaus with the object of developing a program of legislative relief for agricultural interests to be presented to the coming assembly session.

It was stated, however, by farm bureau representatives here that the 43 presidents of county farm bureaus would hold their regular annual meeting in Bozeman January 10 and 15, and intended to devote considerable attention to legislative matters.

It was further stated that the farmers of the state were seeking not so much the enactment of new and sweeping statutes, as the enforcement of existing laws, although it is understood that the farmers will seek the passage of an act to enable state banks to loan money to agriculturists on warehouse receipts.

Mr. Selvidge's letter to Mr. Harlan asks for suggestions relative to the holding of a meeting, and states that the association would be willing to defray the actual expenses of such a gathering.

Fergus Assessor Spent $2.62 During Campaign

Special to The Daily Tribune. Lewistown, Nov. 21.—Most of the candidates in the recent election have filed their expense accounts on time. A number of them, said out no money for campaign expenses and all the amounts expended are very small, that of W. R. Woods, Jr., successful candidate for sheriff, being the largest, $201.75 while F. J. Sherman, elected assessor, got off with an expense account of $2.62.

Jack disappeared from the home of the artist in New York a week ago. Hearing the call of the wild, he sought the vastness of Central Park and was monarch of all he surveyed during his first day's truancy. Just as soon as his runaway was reported to the police, every policeman and taxi chauffeur in the neighborhood started looking for Jack. He had always been very friendly to all the policemen and the chauffeurs while he was a domestic dog.

Spurred on by the reward of $100 offered by the artist for the return of his favorite, hundreds of boy formed "hunting parties." Many lines they sighted their "prey." And just as many times Jack eluded them and hid away in some cave or brush he had found during his wanderings.

Also seeing visions of one hundred good American dollars that would be transferred from the pocket of Byrnes to their own strong boxes should they catch Jack, scores of policemen ran themselves almost bowlegged every time they saw the vagrant dog. Then there came a change. There must have been the odor of a steak; there might have been a yearning for the home he had once loved so well in the brain of the dog; then, again it might have been something in the kind voice of the policeman. Anyway, Jack was tired of the wild; tired of the ceaseless chase—tired of almost everything.

DISCONTENT ALREADY APPARENT IN RANKS OF REPUBLICAN PARTY

Majorities in Congress So Big They Are Unwieldy and Different Factions Are Aligning to Put Something Over on Each Other.

By C. E. G. BRYANT.

Washington, Nov. 21.—Three months in advance of the formal ushering in of the Harding administration and but three weeks after the political landslide, discontent and signs of storms have made their appearance in Republican circles. The party animosities that were held in check long enough to obtain a change at Washington are cropping out and seeking ways for expression.

Republican leaders themselves see the troubles. The very size of their majorities in house and senate is disquieting. It points to unwieldy party organization and carelessness in voting.

The two elements of conflict in the party were distinguished more than a decade ago as progressives and reactionaries. Time has not made progressives out of the reactionaries any more than it has reversed the character of the progressives. For the time being the number of the latter is no doubt considerably weakened, but those who remain are belligerent.

Watching Each Other. These factions are now watching one another with much dislike. They are planning moves in congress that are antagonistic. This is the situation respecting legislation to regulate the packers, which is intended to deprive them of any monopoly of food products, control of prices paid to farmers and control of the banks. Progressives are behind the legislation, which is known as the Kenyon-Kendrick bill. The measure is the unfinished business in the senate and as such is due to come up for first consideration when congress meets.

Progressives have been informed that Old Guard Republicans are getting together to defeat the Kenyon-Kendrick bill. Senators Kenyon, Kendrick, Capper, Norris and other progressives are planning to throw their support behind the bill for a fight to the finish.

Dozen of Them. They will number at least a dozen, and they may command considerable support on the Democratic side of the house. A dozen men in the United States, though eventually beaten, may make things hum so long as they stand together. Therefore, when reactionaries such as Wadsworth, Watson and Penrose try to throw out this bill the country may see the beginning of a new fight in the party.

This is but an instance of where trouble may be expected. Others are found in the differences existing between the west and the east over legislation and division of the spoils of victory. Identically, all the progressives are from the west. They will naturally seek to take advantage of conditions to wage their fight to make the Republican party progressive.

For Farm Legislation. One of the conditions concerns the farmers who have had difficult times as to prices for their products and credits for their farming operations. Several westerners in the senate and house have remedies to offer. One item is a bill to make legal co-operative action of farmers in disposing of their products. This passed the house last session but ran into obstacles at the senate end of the capitol. It would enable the farmer to name the price of the goods he raises and sells. Eastern politicians are not enthusiastic over this legislation or over other measures being discussed for improvement of agricultural conditions. Westerners are demanding among other things the elimination of gambling in grain and of other practices that beat down the price of the farmers' wheat.

1,000 WAR VETERANS O. K'D FOR TRAINING IN VOCATIONAL WAY

Many Montana Boys Unfitted for Pre-War Occupations Because of Service, to Benefit.

Helena, Nov. 21.—More than 1000 disabled ex-service men of this state, unable to resume their pre-war occupations because of injuries sustained while fighting for Uncle Sam, have been approved for vocational education, according to Leif Frederick, supervisor of the Federal board for vocational education for the Montana district. Of this number 310 are actually in training, while the others may commence any time that they are ready to do so.

Many Postpone Course Many of the men have, for personal and business reasons, requested a postponement of their course, while others are not physically able to avail themselves of training at this time.

Ninety men, states Mr. Frederick, are learning trades through practical experience "on the job" with various industrial establishments. Two hundred and twenty are attending state schools and commercial colleges. At the Agricultural college, Bozeman, there are 95 vocational students supported by the government.

Receive $100 Month The university at Missoula claims 65, and five disabled veterans are studying engineering at the state school of mines, Butte.

SMELL OF STEAK TAMES GENE BYRNES' WOLFHOUND

Gene Byrnes, the popular cartoonist, author of "Wide Awake Willie" and "Legal Beavers," two widely circulated comics, has discovered another "legal beaver." This time it happens to be a New York policeman who found and returned "Jack," Byrnes' champion wolfhound, the grandson of one of Admiral Peary's kamohs Miamutes, who helped drag him to the North Pole.

Jack disappeared from the home of the artist in New York a week ago. Hearing the call of the wild, he sought the vastness of Central Park and was monarch of all he surveyed during his first day's truancy. Just as soon as his runaway was reported to the police, every policeman and taxi chauffeur in the neighborhood started looking for Jack. He had always been very friendly to all the policemen and the chauffeurs while he was a domestic dog.

Spurred on by the reward of $100 offered by the artist for the return of his favorite, hundreds of boy formed "hunting parties." Many lines they sighted their "prey." And just as many times Jack eluded them and hid away in some cave or brush he had found during his wanderings.

Also seeing visions of one hundred good American dollars that would be transferred from the pocket of Byrnes to their own strong boxes should they catch Jack, scores of policemen ran themselves almost bowlegged every time they saw the vagrant dog. Then there came a change. There must have been the odor of a steak; there might have been a yearning for the home he had once loved so well in the brain of the dog; then, again it might have been something in the kind voice of the policeman. Anyway, Jack was tired of the wild; tired of the ceaseless chase—tired of almost everything.

Same Old Jack. And so when the policeman clucked to him he didn't run away with his back bristling. He just crawled along, belly to ground, and in a second the fawning tongue of Jack met the roughened, yet kindly, hand of the policeman.
