

Ancient Ruins.

A correspondent writing from Winslow to the Tucson Citizen furnishes the following description of an exploring expedition in Navajo county:

Explorations and excavations which are being made for the Field Columbian Museum, in the ruins of the Hopi or Moki Indian villages on the mesas of Arizona are bringing results which will prove of inestimable value from archaeological and ethnological standpoints. Up to date nearly 1,000 excavations have been made in four different extinct villages and a total of over 2,000 single objects have been taken from graves and ruins of houses. Among other things which the museum has secured by the work is the finest collection of bahos or Indian prayer sticks extant. There are 1,000 of these in a remarkable state of preservation, some of them being over two feet in length, and cannot be identified by the Hopi astronomer and which probably belonged to the lost societies.

The exposition is known as the Stanley McCormick expedition as the expenses are being paid out of the 5,000 fund given by Mr. McCormick to be used in archaeological and ethnological research among the Hopi. The actual work of excavation is being done by Charles L. Owen, who has superintended the work for four other expeditions of similar character. The expedition started from Chicago on May 20, and the work will be concluded by October 1. Every article taken from the ruins has to be carried a distance of seventy-five miles south and west to Holbrook, and from there it is being delivered by the Santa Fe road free of cost to the museum.

Before their exact scientific value can be ascertained it will be necessary to have them classified. One important deduction is made, however, from the discovery of ruins situated over 100 miles north and east of the Oraibi wash, and found it to be distinctly Hopi in culture.

The most important work of the present expedition was done at the old Woipi, situated about six miles north of Mishonovi, on the first mesa. In eleven burying grounds 1,000 pieces of ancient pottery were taken, 285 lots of bahos, sixteen medicine outfits, comprising 569 objects, numberless flint and stone objects, gourds, vessels, textile fabrics, shell ornaments, animal bones, beads, stone implements, locks of hair, antlers, seeds, turquoise ornaments and paints. In all 70 graves were opened, and in one of them was found the well preserved skeleton of a little child lying in its cradle. These graves were from one to seven feet deep and were marked by projecting stone head-pieces. Many skulls and skeletons in a fair state of preservation were secured, and six painted stone tablets on which were painted cloud symbols for the various world quarters. In two of the smaller grave yards a type of pottery was found that is declared to be unique. In coloring, form and finish this pottery is unlike any hitherto known to have been used by the Hopis.

Other pottery unearthed resembles that in use or found in Hopi ruins, which dated back so far that Hopi residence there is a matter of tradition only. The traditional residences of the Spanish priests killed by the Hopi in the sixteenth century were excavated and explored, but nothing of value was found. One of the most interesting finds was that of the kiva or cave in which Katsinas, or prayer bearing spirits, were supposed to live when they came on a visit from Kish-u-u, or the traditional home of the gods way to the north. The first excavations were made at the ruins of the Payupki on the north edge of the Middle mesa, six miles from the Mishonovi.
