

Senator Wilson was a part of the public life of territory and state. Yet here now the chapter ends, the curtain falls. But if it is over for him, it is in a sense over for us, for whatever comes, the day's doings are not to be the same, the moving finger writes a new record, with new names, new events, new issues, new thoughts—new, yet ever old, for there is nothing new in human character, nothing new in human destiny; only the old story with an endless procession of new actors. The lives of every one of us who long knew Mr. Wilson touched at some point the same affairs, the same history, the same onward march of time and sweep of tide.

"This life was showered with honors and the common portion of human vicissitudes. This man had friends who treasured him, a family who loved him and a constituency that trusted him. He had a worthy part in mighty events. He knew the great of a nation, and they knew and honored him. He had a remarkable inheritance through a distinguished ancestry of personal knowledge, memories and associations covering the largest outstanding episode of our national history. He contributed a notable share to the upbuilding of a splendid state. He was a teacher of sound moral precepts and a leader of political thought through his fine newspaper. He preached honest journalism. He owned sturdy convictions. He had fixed ideals. He lived uprightly and he died bravely."
