Strategy of an Interview.
 There was only one man in Denver who could authoritatively deny or affirm a rumor that the great Independence gold mine at Cripple Creek has been sold by W. S. Stratton to an English syndicate, and that was John Hays Hammond, the famous mining expert.

In the lobby of the Brown Palace Hotel stood a group of newspaper men and discussed the ways and means for securing the coveted interview, for Mr. Hammond had refused to see them. In the party was "Little Lord Fauntleroy," a reporter for a morning paper. He had said that his mother and Mr. Hammond were personal friends, and one of the men had remarked that that ought to land the story for him. They saw him walk to the other side of the lobby and write upon a card and hand it to a bellboy. One of the reporters hurried upstairs, stopped the boy and read on the card:

VIVIAN BURNETT,
 Son of Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett.

The reporter tore from his copy paper a slip and wrote thereon:

ARTHUR CLARK,
 Son of old man Clark.

"Give that to Hammond, too," he said to the boy.

The reporter joined his comrades and presently the boy came down and said:

"Mr. Hammond says he will see old man Clark's boy."—Saturday Evening Post.
