How It Grows

WHEN, on a street on which there are 100 telephone users, fifteen telephones are added, it means that we may have to provide an additional distribution cable to serve that street.

When the same thing happens on six or eight nearby streets, served from the same cable terminal, it requires new main cables from terminal boxes to the exchange.

Such increases from several localities soon call for additions to switchboard and terminal room facilities.

Finally a new exchange, with its costly equipment, must be built, and extensive re-distribution made of the outside plant.

These are some of the elements which enter into the cost of supplying telephone service to growing communities and which make adequate rates imperative.
