Golden Rules for Dinner.

"There are a few good rules," he said, "that can be followed, but in the main, cooking cannot be made the subject of cast from directions. In the matter of steak, it should never be lost sight of that the true flavor of a broiled steak must be spoiled if a coal fire is used. There are certain fumes of gas in coal which contribute to its combustion, and these gases penetrate the meat. It is not apparent to an average eater, but to a refined palate it is apparent at once.
