INSANE PATIENT FOUGHT FIERCELY WITH 3 GUARDS

The story of a desperate hand-to-hand fight at St. Elizabeth's in the night between a lunatic on the one side and two able-bodied attendants and a "trusty" on the other side was told today to the special Congressional committee investigating the Government Hospital for the Insane.

It was the story of the encounter between William M. Gartrell, a survivor of the Maine and now insane, and the "trusty" and the two attendants, Cowling and Thorne. George B. Gartrell, a brother of the insane man, went before the committee and said, in tones tense with indignation, that the three men had beaten his brother shamefully and that the asylum authorities knew nothing of the matter until he discovered it and reported it to them at noon the following day, more than twelve hours after it had happened. In fact, he said, prior to his gruesome discovery the asylum physicians had told him his brother had "spent a comfortable night."

On the other hand, the testimony of the asylum authorities was that Gartrell made a murderous attack on his special attendant, Cowling, and Thorne and the "trusty" had to help subdue Gartrell to save Cowling's life. Mr. Cowling said he choked Gartrell.

Thaw Tells Own Story Of the Killing of White

In Broken Sentences He Indicates Motive to Have Been Jealousy and Revenge—Declares Dead Man Ruined His Wife.

NEW YORK, June 26.—Harry K. Thaw, millionaire assassin of Stanford White, the world famous architect, early this morning told his own story of the killing. Jealousy, hate and revenge were the motives. He said:

"We were all at a party at Martins, the old Delmonico place, Mrs. Thaw and her stepfather, W. J. Holman, a broker, and others were present. You will find out who they were later.

"I was sitting at some distance from my wife. Suddenly I saw her get very pale and begin to shiver. I thought she was ill.

"I made a motion to inquire what was the matter. She called a waiter and wrote a note which she sent around the table to me. The note said: 'That dirty blackguard is here.'

"Then I turned and saw that damned scoundrel sitting there, big, fat and healthy, and there she was all trembling and nervous."

NO REGRET FOR DEED.

Thaw's face was covered with perspiration as he talked, but he never asked about White. He was seemingly calm, although he must have been exerting himself to be calm. Thaw asked for a cigar, and kept puffing away at it, even after it had gone out. Again and again, Thaw referred to the incident at Martins. "That poor, delicate little thing, all nervous and shaking like a reed," he said. "And there he was, the big, healthy scoundrel, God! "This man ruined my wife! He won't do this any more, or ruin any more homes. White deserved all he got. This statement by Thaw was made as he sat in the Tenderloin station. He repeated parts of it time and time again, as a man would do in the excitement of the moment. The deadly pallor that had marked him at the roof garden had not entirely gone.

MRS. THAW ALONE WALKS TO COURT TO SEE HUSBAND

Police Had Made An Unsuccessful All Night Search For Her.

NEW YORK, June 26.—Evelyn Nesbit Thaw walked into the detective bureau at police headquarters today a few minutes after her husband, Harry K. Thaw, had been taken from there to Jefferson Market court, where he was arraigned, charged with the murder of Stanford White.

Mrs. Thaw was alone, and evidently walked to headquarters from where she left a street car. She was dressed all in black, with a large black picture hat, and looked strikingly beautiful.

"Is Harry Thaw here?" she asked at the desk.

"No, he has gone to Jefferson Market court," she was told.

"Thank you, I will go there," she said.

She walked out of the building and up Mulberry street to Bleeker street, where she turned left toward Broadway.

No move was made to take Mrs. Thaw

TRAGIC CLIMAX ON ROOFGARDEN BEFORE CROWD

Millionaire Slayer Claims Famous Architect Ruined His Wife Before His Marriage to Her—Held for Murder by Coroner.

NEW YORK, June 26.—Harry Kendall Thaw, the young Pittsburg millionaire and brother of the Countess of Yarmouth, was arraigned in Jefferson Market court, charged with the sensational shooting and killing of Stanford White, the millionaire architect, during a performance late last night in Madison Square Roof Garden for some real or fancied wrong that White had done Evelyn Nesbit, the actress and artists' model, whose marriage to young Thaw a year ago was a society sensation.

Thaw was quite calm when arraigned this morning. He was still dressed in his evening clothes and was somewhat bedraggled from his long night in the police station cell.

COMMITTED TO THE TOMBS.

Thaw's arraignment before Magistrate Barlow was over within a minute and he was remanded to the custody of the coroner. Once more the prisoner was bundled into the patrol wagon, after being handcuffed, and taken to the criminal courts building, where he was arraigned before Coroner Dooley. There was a tremendous crowd in the office of the coroner, and Thaw, seeing that several photographers were trying to take his picture, hid his face behind his hat. On an affidavit, signed by Patrolman Debs, that Thaw said to him, "I shot him," he was held without bail and committed to the Tombs.

It was arranged that the inquest will be held before Coroner Dooley on Thursday morning at 9:30 o'clock. The district attorney's office was represented at the coroner's hearing by Assistant District Attorneys Knott and Turnbull. Thaw would make no statement after being taken to his cell in the Tombs, but spent some time going over the events of the night with his counsel.

Friends say today that he has long brooded over the wrong, said to have been done to his wife by White, and said that he has recently

MISSOURI FORBIDS TRUST TO COLLECT ADMITTED CLAIMS

Missouri Trust Law

ST. LOUIS, June 26.—Judge Ryan, of the St. Louis circuit bench, has ruled that the Cahill-Swift Manufacturing Company is a member of the plumbing trust, and, therefore, has forfeited its right to ask the State's aid in the collection of its debts.

Plumber Owed $240.83.

The case was that of the Cahill-Swift company against Joseph E. Walsh, a plumber, to recover $240.83 in payment for material which Walsh received. Walsh admitted receiving the material, but refused to pay on the sole ground that the Cahill-Swift company belonged to a pool in restraint of trade, and, therefore, could not collect the debt under the anti-trust laws of Missouri. Walsh testified that for three years
