Northeast Washington

The steel skeleton forming the roof over the concourse of the new Union Station, which has been attracting much attention for months past, is one of the largest structures of the kind in Washington. The concourse will occupy the back part of the station, opening into all its many waiting rooms, halls, and corridors. The space to be covered by the immense roof is 559 feet long by 89 feet wide, and occupies the ground floor of the station on the back side, to be on the same level as the tracks on the viaduct, and the story above the tunnel section on the east end of the structure, access to which from Southern trains and those going south will be by elevators from the tunnel basement.

Immense Steel Arches

The steel work was constructed by the American Bridge Company, and is now rapidly nearing completion at the extreme west end of the station. The handling of the immense steel arches and the heavy girders was effected by a huge movable crane, now being torn down bit by bit to make room for the last arches and the smaller detail of the construction. Workers under the supervision of the contractors and architect began setting up this part of the roof last February, and the work has been pushed forward as rapidly as possible since that time. The skeleton of the roof will be covered partly with slate and partly with glass, making the interior as light as day. The small construction at the top is fitted with many openings, to be worked out completely by electric fans from below. The dome of the concourse will be tiled in colored figures, the signs for which have been worked out on a big scale, the drawing being now in the architect's office.

Rushing Work of Construction

It is the purpose of the railroad companies to push the concourse to completion, even before the finishing of the main structure, when it will be temporarily partitioned off and used as a station. The viaduct is now practically ready for laying down the tracks, and should be put in condition for running in trains within a month. No definite date has been set for the operation of trains into the temporary station, but it is known that the contractor hopes to have it ready by November, this year. The chief reason for haste is to permit the removal of tracks over a part of the plaza, so as to allow the filling in of the remainder of the open space and the use of the street approaches. The entire station will not be completed probably for two years.

Hannan has not been able to give the attention to the club of late which it needed, and a slump followed which knocked the players out of their berth. The players of the defunct team were allowed to join other clubs in the league.
