

a tallness during the winter, but in the summer spent much of her time at Portsmouth, N. H., and vicinity, wishing to be near her father.

He was court-martialed in New York on the charge of forgery in January, 1907, and sentenced to seven years in the naval prison on January 28, 1907. He was sent to the Southern on February 6, 1907, and was released July 27, 1910.

When he enlisted, Mr. Lauer gave his home as Chicago and his birthplace as Tiffin, Ohio. Regarding his past, Mr. Lauer was very reticent, saying that he preferred to give no reason for his desertion and did not care to incur possibly the displeasure of the Navy Department by discussing the circumstances of his conviction.

Shields the Bank. "I would prefer that you speak of me as if you have to—as a private," said Mr. Lauer when asked about his being an officer. "There are thousands of privates, but officers are few comparatively, and I would not wish to cast disgrace on any rank by having it appear to the world that I was an officer."

Mr. Lauer said he hurried to Washington on the first train he could get to claim his belongings and waited for him. He arrived here last Thursday morning and registered at the St. James Hotel, where he remained two days arranging for his marriage. "You can say that my sentence was cut exactly in half because of good behavior and excellent service, which were the reasons given in the letter from the Navy Department remitting three and one-half years of my one-half of my seven-year sentence to the day. My excellent service meant my work as chief clerk of the commander, no special act being responsible for my release."

Hair Tinged With Gray. Though only thirty-three years old, Mr. Lauer bears evidence of his trouble. His hair is slightly tinged with gray and his face is marked with fine wrinkles, but his eyes are bright and his face is wreathed almost constantly in a happy smile. His spirits are high, and he seems to live in the happy anticipation that one day he will not only be free, but that his name will be stainless.

Sharing quietly but none the less fondly in the optimism of his future is Mrs. Lauer, whose comely face and features hardly reflect her thirty-three years. She is supposed to have had the realization of her hopes, beaming with smiles of love and devotion.

POLICE AND LINER'S ALERT STEWARD

NEARING THE FINISH. Inspector Dew and Dominion Police, Disguised As Pilots, Rowing Out To Meet the Montrose.

DOMINICK KEAN, Bedroom Steward On the Montrose, Who Claims He Was the First To Suspect Identity of Disguised Miss Leneve.

It was said afterward that Mrs. Neave had given her appeal to be delivered to the daughter, asking her not to shield Crippen, and also clothing for the girl.

Friends' Identity Concealed. Although considerable pains are being taken to conceal the identity of friends of Crippen, who arranged for his defense by Arthur Newton, one of the foremost solicitors in criminal cases in London, it was declared today that they included Crippen's former partners.

NEW YORK, Aug. 3.—If the British police expect to convict Dr. Hawley Harvey Crippen of the murder of his wife, Belle Elmore, on the testimony of Ethel Leneve, the doctor's girl companion, they will be sadly disappointed, in the opinion of Mrs. Fred Ginnett, of Roselle, N. J., who has returned from Quebec.

Mrs. Ginnett, who was the closest friend of the woman believed to have been slain by Crippen, went to Quebec to identify him, the girl, and the wife's jewelry. She made the identification and had a conversation with Miss Leneve. As she was the only person, outside of police circles, who was allowed to see the girl, she is eminent.

When Mrs. Ginnett was told that after a full day of examination, persuasion, and cablegrams from members of her family and friends the Leneve girl had only said: "If anything was done in London I know nothing about it," she remarked emphatically.

A Stubborn Girl. "It is my firm belief that that is all that will ever get out of her. I do not believe that, if she does know anything, any amount of cross-questioning, persuasion, or bulldozing will make her talk. She does not look strong physically, but she impressed me as a girl who could and would be very obstinate and close-mouthed if she wished to be."

"When I say that she does not appear to be strong physically, I do not mean that she is ill or broken down. In fact, she looked much better in Quebec Monday than when I knew her in London. Then she was pale, thin, and seemed anemic. Now she is stouter, and the voyage has left color in her cheeks."

"Of course, I was not allowed to question her about important points, but the way she set her mouth and the look of determination that came into her eyes when I even approached the subject proved to me that she will not be an easy person for the police to handle."

"Do you think, Mrs. Ginnett," she was asked, "that Dr. Crippen has married Miss Leneve, so that she is in a legal position, as his wife, that she cannot be called upon to testify against him?"

"No," she replied, "I do not think they are married. At least, she wore no wedding ring. I did not ask her if she had married him, and she probably would not have told me if I had."

"Do you think from what you saw in Quebec that Dr. Crippen is guilty of the death of his wife?"

"I do," she answered, positively. "I believe he is guilty. His appearance and the jewels in his possession, which I know were the property of my friend, Belle Elmore, made me confident that he killed her. But if the authorities are relying on what they may learn from Ethel Leneve to convict him, they will discover very soon that they have made a mistake and that she is not the weak girl she may appear to be."

Mrs. Lothe Neave, mother of the girl, today talked for some time with this
