The Survivor

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters. Douglas Grest finds life at the hills very dull. He is cramped and disgusted by the beauty of the place and the crystallized over his guardian, Simon Strong. He is even more disgusted with Simon's wife, the daughter Jean, which is all the more because he really does like the sister of Jean, but not the latter's different type of girl. The young man makes up his mind to go to London and his only regret is leaving Cissy behind. On the night of the flight Simon Strong is murdered. Douglas is instantly suspected. He is taken to the police station and, after a short stay, is released without baggage. He finds his way into the private compartment of the Countess de Rieux, where he meets a young man who is very handsome and very interesting to both. Douglas is very much attracted to the young man, who is very handsome and very interesting to both. Douglas is very much attracted to the young man, who is very handsome and very interesting to both.

CHAPTER XXXV. A Scene at the Club.

He made her sit down, for she was white and faint. For the moment he left her question unanswered. "You have learned the truth, Joan, from his own lips," he said. "Confession, which he sipped last week before the fever set in. You can read it if you like." "There is no need," she answered. "I have heard enough. Who is the Emily de Rieux?" "She is a very clever woman," he said. "With whom your brother became most unreasonably infatuated. She took an interest in him, as she has done in many young literary men. He fell in love with her without any encouragement, and she was the cause of his foolishness in a most unworkable manner. He neglected his duties and followed her about, his position and his friends—eventually, as you see, his reason." "I cannot tell you any more than that. She was perhaps unwise in her kindness, perhaps a little vain, inasmuch as she liked to be the literary inspirer of young talent and to surround herself with brilliant people. That is the chief reason for her fault. I do not believe that for a moment she deliberately encouraged him. She was simply a creature of her own nature, and you are responsible for the wreck of his life." "You perhaps know her?" "Yes." "I think that I may say so." "Then you can tell her this," she said. "Tell her that before long she will have a visit from David Strong's sister." Douglas shook his head. "It is not she who is to blame," he said. "She pointed to the room which they had left." "Men do not become like that," she said. "Of their own will, or from their own fault alone. Did you not hear him say that it was she who had destroyed him? Am I to lose father and brother, and husband, Douglas, and sit meekly in my bimber corner?" "As to the last," he said, "you know that it was your father's fault, and not mine. He was given to me, and we obeyed in those days. He ruled us like a tyrant. One would not wish to speak evil of the dead, or else one would surely say that it was he who was responsible for the evil things which have come upon us as a drudge because I did the work which was my duty. You were mine, and I wanted you. When you stole away from me, I have tried to hunt you down because I hated you. You have escaped me now, but I shall hate you always. Remember, Douglas Grest, some day you may yet have cause to." She left him speechless, too amazed to think of making her any answer. It was Joan who had said these things to him. Joan the silent, with her handsome face and her father's dogged silence. Never again would he believe

Pain's Fireworks Stage Is Interesting

There are many interesting sights beholding the scenery, especially in the fireworks display, which nightly closes the exhibition of Pain's "Last Days of Pompeii." Back of the artificial city in an open space stands a rick against which the rockets are leaning, a row of them, like a picket fence. One of the assistant pyrotechnists has charge of this part of the spectacle, and it is a duty not entirely free from danger. With a torch, the fireman moves along the line of rockets, touching one after another; they hiss for a moment, then shoot aloft with the speed and lightness of a bird. Near by are the heavy steel mortars from which the bombs are fired, and greater caution must be exercised in the loading and firing of these than in lighting the rockets. The artist stoops low and turns his face away, as if a five-foot shell he applies the torch to the fuse, which sputters and throws sparks all about it. The bombs are shells of mache paper, loaded with the fireworks that burn when the shells explode. The portraits and pieces are most difficult to construct, for they require a small amount of artistic skill to arrange on the lattice frames the little sticks of composition.

CHIEF WHO KISSED GIRL CLERK IS BACK

Pension Office Section Head Is Reinstated After Four Days' Suspension.

Frank D. Hester, section chief in the Pension Office, suspended for kissing a girl clerk, is back at his post today, his restoration having been ordered by Pension Commissioner Baltzger. Mr. Hester was out only four days instead of the ninety to which Commissioner Baltzger at first sentenced him. It was stated at the Pension Office today that while Hester did kiss the girl clerk in question, his offense seems to have been less grave than at first thought. It is reported that the kiss was given as the result of a "dare" and that Mr. Hester, being a young man of spirit, refused to be dared. Commissioner Baltzger, though not approving of office joking, believes that
