some one of the many pretty children that were brought in to her haven. But she always denied herself the coveted happiness. There are people who, laying adolatrons affection upon one object, suffer from a sort of soul contraction and lose their power of caring for others. Miss Cotton was one of them. She understood herself well enough to know it was so, and feeling it to be her duty to the great world of homeles bables to keep herself unfettered by any special ties, she resolutely refused to be drawn into any tangling alkance with blus-eyed girls or browneyed boys. So year after year found her bravely turning them over to the foster parents, whose sympathies had been enlisted in the little ones' behalf, while the only treasures she permitted her own heart to harbor were memories of their clinging arms and choking sohs when they left her for faces that were strange.

But one day a great temptation came. It was the morning of the twentieth anilversary of her installation as matron of the Almex. It was about 30 clock in the morning when they brought him in from the station hiuse. A policeman had picked him out of a long wooden box near the entrance of the alley, just a little while before light came, and, as usual, they had brought him in from the station hiuse. A policeman had picked him out of a long wooden box near the entrance of the alley, just a little while before light came, and, as usual, they had brought him direct to her. He was decidedly the prettiest baby the Annex had everknown. He was asseep when Miss Cotton took him to her plump, strong arms. She looked at the carling brown hair, the long dark lashes and the flushed, dimpled face, and then, fairly intoxicated with the perfume of his sweet breath, she smiled and said aloud: "I wish I might—". But she remembered her weakness, and the other half of her wish trembled on her lips, then died

A True Maxim.

Nothing succeeds like success, is a maxim well applied to Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup, for this famous remedy succeeds in curing every case of croup, cough and cold which it undertakes, and to this alone is due its wonderful popularity. Mrs. E. W. Richards, 2214 E. Cumberland St., Philadelphia, Pa., states: "I have had Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup on my bureau for the last nine years, and have found it a certain and safe cure for croup. I have also found it efficacious in extreme membraneous croup, and would advise all mothers to use it." Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup costs only 25 cents, and you should bear in mind, that substitutes simply benefit the dealer's purse. Insist on getting Dr. Bull's Cough Syrop.

man had said. She did not doubt her it was all true.

"Yea," she said faintly.

"May wo see the boy, please?" asked Mrs. Eldred.

Mechanically Miss Cotton went up to her own room wher she had left film playing. She lifted the sturdy hitle chap in her arms and with his face pressed close to hers and his graw around her neck she carried him down stairs. She walked to the west window, where the cloud-dimmed light of avening could strike them most clearly, and my constant companion. You have other children, perhaps?" The woman modded. "Then will you not let me keep my little Hiram, my baby?"

The mother hesitated, and her companion took it upon herself to answer: "You are asking more than human nature can grant," she said. "We had never thought of it in that light before, but we now realize that you have formed a strong attachment for him. We are sorry for you, but now that our long search has been successful, we cannot give up its object. May we take him now? We wish to go away to-night." Instinctively the haby understood that there was something the matter. His chost heaved with sobs of fright and his arms pressed Miss Cotton's neck more tightly.

"Human law, and I suppose, divine right, are on your side. You may take him, said Miss Cotton.

She sai him down in his high chair in the midst of his toys and playthings and gathered up part of his clothing. Then she pressed him to her heart and kissed him good bye.

They bruised one soft white fist and made a rent in his dainty garments in taking him from her, but the puny strength with which he clung to the only thing he loved was finally exhausted, and the door of the Annex closed behind him. She picked up a little shoe from the floor and consecrated the soiled leather with tears and kisses. Darkness came on. Some one from the station rang the bell and she knew that they had brought in another baby. They called her, but she did not answer. She knelt beside the window and with her head resting on the sill, she looked logingly through the gloom to the south, where stretched the road over which her baby had been taken away. which her baby had been taken
