SKETCHES FROM SELF-HELP.
FLAXMAN AND HIS WIFE.

In the year 1782, when twenty-seven years of age, he quitted his father's roof and rented a small house and studio in Wardour street, London; and what was more, he married—Ann Denham was the name of his wife—and a cherry, bright, smiling, noble woman she was. He believed that in marrying her he should be able to work with an intense spirit; for, like him, she had a taste for poetry and art, and besides, was an enthusiastic admirer of her husband's genius. Yet when Sir Joshua Reynolds—himself a bachelor—met Flaxman shortly after his marriage, he said to him, "So, Flaxman, I am told you are married; if so, I tell you you are ruined for an artist." Flaxman went straight home, sat down beside his wife, took her hand in his, and said, "Ann, I am ruined for an artist." "How so, John?" "How has it happened? and who has done it?" "It happened," he replied, "in the church and Ann Denham has done it. He then told her of Sir Joshua's remark, whose opinion was well known, and had been often expressed, that if students would excel, they must bring the whole powers of their mind to bear upon their art. From that time, he studied the grand works of Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others at Rome and Florence. He said, "I have been drawing up to my little figure, and its height, 'I would be a great artist.' And a great artist you shall be," said his wife, and visit Rome too, if that be really necessary to make you great." "But how?" asked Flaxman. "Work and economize," rejoined the brave wife; "I will never have it said that Ann Denham ruined John Flaxman for an artist." And so it was determined by the pair that the journey to Rome was to be made when their means would admit. "I will go to Rome," said Flaxman, and show to the president of the wedlock is for a man's good rather than his harm; and you, Ann, shall accompany me."

CHARTREY.

Chantry was a robust man—every inch of him English. He was somewhat rough, but hearty in his demeanor; proud of his successful struggle with the difficulties which beset him in early life, and above all, proud of his independence. He was born a poor man's child; at Norton, near Sheffield. His father, dying when he was mere boy, his mother married again. Young Chantry used to drive an ass laden with milk across his back into the neighboring town of Sheffield, and there serve his mother's customers with milk. Such was the humble beginning of his industrial career, and it was by his own strength that he rose from that position, and achieved the highest eminence as an artist. Not taking kindly to his stepfather, the boy was sent to trade, and was first placed with a grocer in Sheffield. The business was very distasteful to him; but, passing a carver's shop window one day, his eye was attracted by the glittering articles it contained, and charmed with the idea of being a carver, he begged to be released from the grocery business with this object. His friends consented, and he was bound apprentice to a carver and gilder for seven years.

DAVID WILKIE.

The son of a poor Scotch minister, he gave early indications of an artistic talent; and though he was a negligent and inapt scholar, he was a sedulous drawer of faces and figures. A silent boy, he already displayed that quiet concentrated energy of character which distinguished him through life. He was always on the lookout for an opportunity to draw, and the walls of the manse, or the smooth sand by the river side, came alike convenient for his purpose. Any sort of tool would serve him; like Giotto, he found a pencil in every house; and prepared to draw on any smooth stone, and the subject for a picture in every ragged mendicant he met. When he visited a house, he generally left his mark on the walls as an indication of his presence, sometimes to the disgust of cleanly housewives. In short, notwithstanding the aversion of his father, the minister, to the "sinful" profession of painting, Wilkie's strong propensity was not to be thwarted, and he became an artist, working his way manfully up the steep of difficulty.

From that time, he studied the grand works of Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others at Rome and Florence. He said, "I have been drawing up to my little figure, and its height, 'I would be a great artist.' And a great artist you shall be," said his wife, and visit Rome too, if that be really necessary to make you great." "But how?" asked Flaxman. "Work and economize," rejoined the brave wife; "I will never have it said that Ann Denham ruined John Flaxman for an artist." And so it was determined by the pair that the journey to Rome was to be made when their means would admit. "I will go to Rome," said Flaxman, and show to the president of the wedlock is for a man's good rather than his harm; and you, Ann, shall accompany me."

CHARTREY.

Chantry was a robust man—every inch of him English. He was somewhat rough, but hearty in his demeanor; proud of his successful struggle with the difficulties which beset him in early life, and above all, proud of his independence. He was born a poor man's child; at Norton, near Sheffield. His father, dying when he was mere boy, his mother married again. Young Chantry used to drive an ass laden with milk across his back into the neighboring town of Sheffield, and there serve his mother's customers with milk. Such was the humble beginning of his industrial career, and it was by his own strength that he rose from that position, and achieved the highest eminence as an artist. Not taking kindly to his stepfather, the boy was sent to trade, and was first placed with a grocer in Sheffield. The business was very distasteful to him; but, passing a carver's shop window one day, his eye was attracted by the glittering articles it contained, and charmed with the idea of being a carver, he begged to be released from the grocery business with this object. His friends consented, and he was bound apprentice to a carver and gilder for seven years.

DAVID WILKIE.

The son of a poor Scotch minister, he gave early indications of an artistic talent; and though he was a negligent and inapt scholar, he was a sedulous drawer of faces and figures. A silent boy, he already displayed that quiet concentrated energy of character which distinguished him through life. He was always on the lookout for an opportunity to draw, and the walls of the manse, or the smooth sand by the river side, came alike convenient for his purpose. Any sort of tool would serve him; like Giotto, he found a pencil in every house; and prepared to draw on any smooth stone, and the subject for a picture in every ragged mendicant he met. When he visited a house, he generally left his mark on the walls as an indication of his presence, sometimes to the disgust of cleanly housewives. In short, notwithstanding the aversion of his father, the minister, to the "sinful" profession of painting, Wilkie's strong propensity was not to be thwarted, and he became an artist, working his way manfully up the steep of difficulty.

FLAXMAN AND HIS WIFE.

In the year 1782, when twenty-seven years of age, he quitted his father's roof and rented a small house and studio in Wardour street, London; and what was more, he married—Ann Denham was the name of his wife—and a cherry, bright, smiling, noble woman she was. He believed that in marrying her he should be able to work with an intense spirit; for, like him, she had a taste for poetry and art, and besides, was an enthusiastic admirer of her husband's genius. Yet when Sir Joshua Reynolds—himself a bachelor—met Flaxman shortly after his marriage, he said to him, "So, Flaxman, I am told you are married; if so, I tell you you are ruined for an artist." Flaxman went straight home, sat down beside his wife, took her hand in his, and said, "Ann, I am ruined for an artist." "How so, John?" "How has it happened? and who has done it?" "It happened," he replied, "in the church and Ann Denham has done it. He then told her of Sir Joshua's remark, whose opinion was well known, and had been often expressed, that if students would excel, they must bring the whole powers of their mind to bear upon their art. From that time, he studied the grand works of Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others at Rome and Florence. He said, "I have been drawing up to my little figure, and its height, 'I would be a great artist.' And a great artist you shall be," said his wife, and visit Rome too, if that be really necessary to make you great." "But how?" asked Flaxman. "Work and economize," rejoined the brave wife; "I will never have it said that Ann Denham ruined John Flaxman for an artist." And so it was determined by the pair that the journey to Rome was to be made when their means would admit.
