

Remember the Living.

The Richmond Times has the following stirring appeal to the people of the South to remember the living disabled and helpless ones among us, as well as to remember proper respect and honor to our gallant dead. We commend it to the Southern people generally:

The Southern people have recently manifested a noble and commendable respect for the memory of the noble men who sacrificed their lives for the cause of Southern independence, by rescuing their humble graves from neglect, oblivion and decay.

It should be borne in mind, however, that the mothers, widows and children of not less than 300,000 dead Confederate soldiers are among us, and that many of them are in circumstances of appalling destitution. There are, also, many thousands maimed and infirm survivors of the war, for whom there is no Government to make adequate provision. To the maimed soldiers of the Federal army, and to the wives and children of those who succumbed to disease, or who fell in battle, or who died from the effects of wounds, to most liberal pensions are paid by the Federal Government. Not content with this, two hundred millions of additional bounty money has just been voted to the disbanded volunteers, who escaped without a scratch.

When we think of these things, we should recollect that the living as well as the dead ex-Confederate soldiers have strong claims upon our warmest sympathies. The widows and orphans of the Confederate dead, and the maimed and helpless of our late armies, should not be forgotten by the humane and charitable people of the South. They have nothing now but our voluntary charity to depend upon. The war has left us impoverished and destitute of all the luxuries of life, but there are not many of us who cannot do some little toward feeding, clothing and educating the widow or the child of some brave soldier who gave his life to a cause which he believed to be just and good.

All of our readers are doubtless familiar with cases of extreme destitution upon the part of the unfortunate classes to which we have alluded. They are alas! to be found everywhere.

We received, a few days since, a letter which nothing but the horrors of absolute want, both of food and clothing for a family and helpless young children, constrained the accomplished widow of a gallant officer, to write to us. The husband of this lady was one of the most gallant and fearless field officers of the army of Northern Virginia. He was killed near Petersburg, and his stubborn valor won the admiration of the men who slew him.

A gentleman by birth and education, and a person before the war of ample means, his tender wife and young children were then strangers to want and privation. And yet since his death his widow and children have been reduced to such terrible straits that his widow was forced to appeal to us for assistance. We do not mention this as an isolated case. There are a thousand just such instances of terrible suffering, not only among the widows and orphans of Confederate officers, but more especially among the families of the private soldiers.

These sufferers are prevented from making their misfortunes known until gaunt famine stands like a wolf at the door.

We trust that the work of decorating and honoring the graves of the dead will go on; but the noblest tribute which we can pay the memory of a dead soldier is to take care of those desolate loved ones who have by the death of their husbands, fathers and sons, been cast upon the cold charities of the world.

Now that the Southern heart is being most generously moved by the efforts of different memorial associations, let the living be remembered as well as the dead.

Let us not commit the melancholy error of expending all of our sympathies upon those whose quiet slumbers no earthly honors can disturb. Let the wives and children and helpless old parents of the gallant dead be taught that we sympathize with them in their irreparable losses, and are willing to contribute to their comfort and happiness.

To accomplish this great and noble work of charity and gratitude, we cannot depend exclusively upon the irregular, uncertain contributions of charitable individuals. There must be organization, State legislation and provision made by the County Courts. There must be, as auxiliary to all this, fairs, concerts, lectures and benevolent societies in every town and County.

A negro at Huntsville, Alabama, recently chopped twelve cords of wood between 9 o'clock, a. m., and sunset. The same freedman has cut an average of seven cords per day for the last eighteen months. He cut twelve cords on a wager of several hundred dollars.
