Why should Hecture? You are young,
And tameless as a dragon-fly,
And beauuful to look upon,
And sweet to touch.
Nothing you know of nerves unstrung,
Nor can I believe that you will de,
And go where other girls have gone.
I ask too rauch.

Tshaw! Fintter like a pretty bird.
Ontron the wind, outlangh the brooks,
Elout the frail ferns with flying feek,
Outbush the rose;
Let your young petulant voice be heard
Joyons through all the forest-nooks,
But where are you drifting, where—my sweet?
Who knows? Who knows?

THE LADRES' MEMORIAL FAIR. The third agent of the fair, under the influences of the fine weather and the calls of duty and patriotism, was by far the most moccessful which has yet been exrienced by the managers. As usual, the inence of the ladies was most perceptibly exerted, and the number of young gentlemen who were escorted to the hall, and led up to be sacrificed to chances by their patriotic female friends, was far more numerous than could be reasonably expect ed. The demand for chances also assumed something like reason, and many rathe lists were completed in short order. Around the refreshment table the scene was also more animated, and many of the daintles were disposed of in different ways by the vendors and vendees to the infinite satisfaction of both parties. With the throng of youth and beauty slowly circling around the rame stand, the whole fair seemed to partake of their influence, and assume a brighter and more attractive appearance. As the signal for the raffle would be given the crowd would stop, and closing around the stand await In silence the chance of fortune. At the seats bealind the tables, in the art gallery, under the particolored folds of the Gypsy tent, all was life and shimation, and until the prescribed hour for closing the crowd grew hardly less. The evening was but an example of what all should have been, and what, judging by the enjoyment of those present, the remaining ones are sure to be. Come, one and all, and, if nothing more, give your countenance to the effort of the ladies.

FAIR PLAY. Fair is foul and foul is fair, say the witches in Macbeth as they hovered through the fog, and so forth. Fair is fowl and fowl is fair, say those who most do congregate around the southwest corner of Hibernian Hall, where stands in refreshing relief and tempting array the beautiful and tastefully arranged table, presided over by Mrs. P. Wineman and her fair assistants, at 4 whereou is displayed both in letters that he who ... ms may reso, and in more substantial form that he who stands may partake of such nourishers of life's feast as chicken salad and roast turkey, to say nothing, or rather to say something, of tempting bivaives, rich cake, smooth and quivering blanc mange, and "words to that effect." But it is not to the har dsome style in which this refreshing re treat is supplied and ornamented, nor in the graceful manner in which it is presided over that we d ire to speak at present. We wish to direct particular at ention to the grand raffle. wherein by investing a dollar one stands a chance of becoming the fortunate possessor of one of the ten following prizes, viz: One United States bond of one hundred dollars, one sterling silver plicher, one silver cake basket, one silver ice pitcher, one pair of bronzed figures, one silver tea pot, one card receiver, one cordial stand, one pair silver sait sellars and half dozen bottles cordial. When we consider the sacred object to which the proceeds of this fair are to be applied there should open even the scanticst purse of South Caroli-nians, but in this grand radie there is an extraor-NAVAL STORES.—The market in
