Headquarters District of South Carolina,
COLUMBIA, MAY 6, 1865.

ORDERS NO. 2.

I. IN order to carry into effect the terms of the Military Convention between Generals Johnston and Sherman, made on the 26th ult., duplicate muster rolls should be prepared at once, upon which all officers and men who come under these terms may enter their names and receive the immunity from molestation therein guaranteed. Major-General Young, Brigadier-Generals Ripley, Robertson, Bianchard, Conner, Chaenut, Preston and Bonham and Major Jenkins, are charged with the duty of preparing these rolls for the signature of such officers and men as may be within their reach. Rolls will also be prepared at these Headquarters for those who are in Columbia and its vicinity.

II. There is no authority to disband troops until the terms prescribed in the convention have been complied with, and the Major-General commanding regrets to observe, on the part of some few demoralized persons, a disposition to interfere by violence even with the articles of public property necessary to enable their superior officers to arrange the terms by which protection can be given to those in the service who desire it; to procure subsistence for the sick and wounded in the hospitals; and to feed the soldiers passing through the State on their way to their distant homes. He trusts that those who have so fought so long and so well, will accept their fate with becoming dignity, and repress any attempts to throw aside the restraints imposed upon us as good citizens and the honored veterans of many battles.

J. Wilkes Booth, who has linked his name with history, and made it famous for all time, is the second son of Junius Brutus Booth, the great tragedian, and is between twenty-six and twenty-seven years of age. He was born and raised in Harford County, Maryland, where his father owned and cultivated a farm. In early life Wilkes showed little ambition for the stage, but, inspired by the success of his brother, Edwin Booth, he went upon the boards as a member of a stock company in Philadelphia, and about the year 1860 he was regarded as almost the rival of Edwin. Indeed, his 'Richard' was said to surpass that of Edwin, and approached nigher the rendition of Booth the elder than any other living actor. At the breaking out of the war of 1861, Wilkes was attached to the troupe of Messrs. Kunkel & Moxley, then performing at the Marshall Theatre, Broad street, in this city, where he appeared under the name of J. B. Wilkes. He went North with most of the company, and has since risen to some distinction in the Northern cities as an actor. Of late, he has been represented by those who knew him as a man of decided anti-slavery sentiments; whereas, prior to the war, he was regarded as a sympathiser with the South. Out of motives of policy his views and sentiments must have undergone change.

Like his father, the elder Booth, Wilkes sometimes indulged in the cup to excess, and on these occasions hallucinations of mind would take possession of and control him as they had done his father, who, on one or two occasions, upon the stage, came nigh committing actual and real murder, instead of the mimic slaying provided for in the play.

In stature J. Wilkes Booth is about five feet ten inches high, of delicate frame, and features capable of being put in fine play, dark, piercing eyes, and dark hair. His intellectual faculties are highly cultivated. A younger brother, Joseph, is, or was a medical student in Philadelphia.

MECCA.—This city is famous as being the birth place of Mahomet, A. D. 371. The temple is a gorgeous structure, much visited by pilgrims. On one of the neighboring hills is a cave, where it is pretended Mahomet usually retired to perform his devotions, and where the greatest part of the Koran was brought to him by the angel Gabriel, A. D. 604. Two miles from the town is the hill where they say Abraham went to offer up Isaac, 1871 B. C.
